תמר, "palm," the Babylonian tree par excellence; ימר לך, Ruth i. 20.

If Aramaic was the original language of the piece, צינתא, "a palm," and צנן, "to cool" (of passion).

Other such plays on words might be suggested; but these may suffice to shew how far those of the Greek text are from constituting an insuperable objection to the theory of a Hebrew original.[1]

Africanus next expresses suspicion of the fact implied by the narrative, that the Jews during the Exile were permitted to exercise the power of life and death among themselves, and even, as in this case, over the royal consort. If, on the other hand, Joacim was not the former king, the account of his external prosperity and high distinction is not true to the historical conditions of the time. Origen's reply is that the state of the Jewish community in the Exile was not altogether wretched; Joacim was the former king; and as to the jus gladii, even at the present day conquered peoples are sometimes allowed to live under their own native jurisdiction. Moreover, it might be that such cases were tried secretly. He is greatly perplexed by the remark that the piece is not found in the Book of Daniel as received by the

[1] "The History of Susanna was confessedly written in Greek. No other explanation can be given of the verbal allusions 54–5, 58–9. In regard to the other additions there are no data." (Pusey, 'Daniel the Prophet,' p. 378 and note.) In the same context, Dr. Pusey remarks of the LXX. version of the Book of Daniel, that "the Greek itself is, in many parts, purer and more elegant than that of any other of the Septuagint translations. The translator avoided Hebraisms, which Theodotion subsequently restored, and, in some places, substituted a classical Greek word." (Ibid. 378–9.) So far, then, as this applies to the Additions, it is obviously no argument against the supposition that they were originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic, like the rest of the book.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Jews; and can only reply that the Jews must have intentionally omitted it, on account of its contents. Many other pieces are also found only in the LXX., and so would have to be rejected along with Susanna. But may it not be that Providence was mainly solicitous of edification in the Holy Scriptures; and ought we not to be mindful of the proverb, "Remove not the ancient landmark" (Prov. xxii. 28)? Africanus further objected that no prophet elsewhere makes use of a quotation in the manner of v. 53, for no prophet required to do so; and lastly he thinks the style different from the Book of Daniel, which Origen denies; but neither goes into detail.

For many centuries the matter lay where Africanus and Origen had left it. After the Reformation, Protestant writers, such as Ludovicus Cappellus, strongly attacked the piece, in the interests of theological controversy, calling it a "silly fable"—fabula ineptissima,—and the author a "trifler"—nugator. Houbigant replied with considerable advantage. Michaelis set himself to expose a whole mass of absurdities in the legal proceedings against Susanna and her accusers. Eichhorn again examined the question, only to prove that "the whole piece may be a moral fiction" (eine moralische Dichtung). Jahn saw in it a parable, shewing that "not always even to men of riper years must an unerringly right judgment be attributed." Bertholdt divined its nature far more correctly in pronouncing the piece a traditional history or Jewish Haggada: "Es scheint daher besser zu sein die Sache als eine Sagengeschichte, als eine jüdische Aggadah zu betrachten." The moral appended in the LXX. text, vv. 63, 64, which is the ground of Jahn's conclusion, is merely a reflection added by the author of that text, and is wanting in Theodotion. Fritzsche rightly remarks that the story is told as authentic history; and he adds: "It is very possible that a tradition (Sage) lay at the basis of the narrative, as the substance of it unhappily stands in direct contradiction to no period; but it may with more certainty be affirmed that the connexion with Daniel is arbitrary. The person of Daniel is, in our opinion, involved in much obscurity; hence it is the more remarkable that this piece is connected with him, according to the etymology of his name [Daniel, "my judge is El"], and that here, as in Ezek. xiv. 14 sqq., xxviii. 3, he is represented as a model of righteousness and wisdom." And here he leaves the matter, although Plessner had already pointed to materials in the Talmud and Midrash which confirm Bertholdt's conjecture. Frankel and Geiger have referred to an old Halachah, which explains much that is surprising in the story; and lastly, Dr. N. Brüll, in an elaborate monograph, has sought to establish, by a careful combination of all available materials, the probable meaning and character of this curious relic of antiquity.[1] Among these materials are certain statements in Origen's reply to Africanus which receive an entirely new significance, when brought into connexion with the data supplied by the Hebrew sources. Thus Origen relates that a learned young Jew, the son of a Rabbi, had informed him that the Two Elders of the story were Ahab and Zedekiah, the false prophets spoken of in Jer. xxix. 20–23, and that the punishments Daniel predicts for them refer to the other world.

What else Origen heard about these Elders may be given in his own words: Καὶ ἕτερον δὲ οἶδα Ἑβραῖον, περὶ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων τούτων τοιαύτας παραδόσεις φέροντα, ὅτι τοῖς ἐν τῇ αἰχμαλωσίᾳ ἐλπίζουσιν διὰ τῆς Χριστοῦ ἐπιδημίας ἐλευθερωθήσεσθαι ἀπὸ τῆς ὑπὸ τοῖς ἐχθροῖς δουλείας προσεποιοῦντο οἱ πρεσβύτεροι οὗτοι ὡς εἰδότες τὰ περὶ Χριστοῦ σαφηνίζειν. Καὶ ἑκάτερος αὐτῶν ἀνὰ μέρος ᾗ περιετύγχανε γυναικὶ καὶ ἣν διαφθεῖραι ἐβούλετο, ἐν ἀπορρήτῳ δῆθεν ἔφασκεν, ὡς ἄρα δέδοται αὐτῷ ἀπὸ θεοῦ σπεῖραι τὸν Χριστόν. εἶτ' ἀπατωμένη τῇ ἐλπίδι τοῦ γεννῆσαι τὸν Χτὸν ἡ γυνὴ ἐπεδίδω ἑαυτὴν τῷ ἀπατῶντι. καὶ οὕτως ἐμοιχῶντο τὰς γυναικὰς τῶν πολιτῶν οἱ πρεσβ. Ἀχιὰβ καὶ Σεδεκίας. To these malpractices, added the Jew, Daniel alludes in addressing the first Elder with πεπαλαιωμένε ἡμερῶν κακῶν (v. 52), and the second with οὕτως ἐποιεῖτε θυγατράσιν Ἰσραήλ κ.τ.λ. (v. 57). St. Jerome also was acquainted with this Jewish tradition, independently of Origen, as it would seem, for he makes the false prophets give a different reason for their conduct: "Aiunt Hebraei—quod propheta nunc loquitur, Et locuti sunt in nomine meo mendaciter, quod non mandavi eis (Jer. xxix. 20), illud significari putant, quod miseras mulierculas, quae circumferuntur omni vento doctrinae, sic deceperint, quo dicerent eis, quia de tribu erant Juda Christum de suo semine esse generandum; quae illectae cupidine praebebant corpora sua, quasi matres futurae Christi" ('Comm. in Jerem.' ad fin.). Compare with these passages Susanna 56, 57. In the Midrash Tanḥûmâ on Leviticus, No. 6, we read: "Ahab b. Kolaiah and Zedekiah b. Maaseiah were already sinners in Jerusalem, but that was not enough. Carried captive to Babylon, they pushed their wickedness there to even further lengths. What did they in Jerusalem? There they were lying prophets. But in Babylon they did not abdicate this their profession, and they assisted each other's guilty designs. Ahab went to one of the magnates of Babylon and said, 'God has sent me hither to speak a word to thy wife.' He said: 'She is before thee; go in.' When Ahab found himself alone with her, he said, 'God willeth that thy children be prophets. Go, therefore, and company with Zedekiah, and thou shalt become the mother of prophets.' She believed him, and did accordingly. In the same way, Zedekiah went, and acted for Ahab. . . . So they went on, until they came to Semiramis, the wife of Nebuchadnezzar. When Zedekiah went to her and spake as before, she answered, 'I can do nothing without my husband's consent; he must come and tell us that he wills it.' So she went to her husband Nebuchadnezzar, and said, 'Send for them.' When they were come, he asked them, 'Did ye speak thus to my wife?' They said, 'Yes, for God will cause prophets to come of her.' 'I have heard,' said N., 'that your God abhors unchastity. Did 24,000 men perish, because of Zimri's degeneracy (Num. xxv. 8, 9), and can you assert such a thing? Has your God changed his mind? Whether ye be true or false prophets, I know not; but Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah I have already proven. Although I had the furnace heated seven days for them, yet they came forth alive and well. For you I will only heat it one day. If you are not hurt by the fire, I shall have the best proof that you are true prophets, and we will do all your bidding.' They objected: 'Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah were three, we are only two, and a miracle cannot be wrought save for three.' Nebuchadnezzar asked: 'Is there then a third such as you?' 'Yes, the High Priest Joshua.' They thought they would be saved for his sake. So Joshua was brought, and thrown with them into the furnace. They were both consumed, but Joshua remained unhurt, as it is said, Zech. iii. 2, 'Lo, that is the brand plucked from the burning.' And from Zedekiah and Ahab was the curse taken which was in the mouth of the whole captivity at Babylon: 'The Lord make thee like Zedekiah,' &c. (Jer. xxix. 22)."

[1] What follows is mainly an abstract of Dr. Brüll's ingenious argument, Das apokryphische Susanna-Buch, in his 'Jahrbücher für Jüdische Geschichte und Literatur' (Frankfurt am Main: 1877).

The same story occurs in the Talmud Bablî Sanhedrin 93 A, where the same passage of Jeremiah is cited with comments. "'It is not said whom he burnt (ישרפם), but whom he roasted (קלם),' said R. Johanan in the name of R. Simeon ben Jochai, teaching that they did as it were vilenesses (בקליות)." Commenting on the next verse, "Because they have done folly in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives," the Gemara continues:—

מאי עבוד אזול לנבי ברתיה דנבוכדנצר אחאב אמר לה כה אמר ה' השמיעי אל צדקיה וצדקיה אמר כה אמר ה' השמיעי אל אחאב אולה ואמרה ליה לאבוה

"By doing what? by going to Nebuchadnezzar's daughter. Ahab said to her, Thus saith the Lord, hearken thou to Zedekiah; and Zedekiah said, Thus saith the Lord, hearken thou to Ahab. She went and told her father," &c. (The italicized variation will be noticed.) The Baraita of R. Eliezer again, c. 33, on the authority of R. Johanan, mentions neither the wife nor the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, but the Chaldean women generally, as thus attempted by Ahab and his confederate in guilt, whom it represents, not as false prophets, but medical charlatans:—

אחאב בן קוליה וצדקיה בן מעשיה נעשו רופאי שקר והיו מרפאים את נשי בישדים ובאים עליהם בתשמיש המטה שמע המלך ואמר לישורפן.

"Ahab ben Qolaiah and Zedekiah ben Maaseiah became pretended physicians. And they used to treat the wives of the Chaldees, and debauch them. The king heard thereof, and commanded them to be burnt."

In the Pesiqta again (Ed. Buber), No. 25, p. 164 f., the story is further modified:—

אחאב בן קוליה וצדקיה בן מעשיה נביאי שקר היו והיו מנאפין נשי רעיהן הה"ד יען אשר עשו ונו' (ירמיה כ"ט כ"ג)

ומה הוון עבדין חד מנהון אזיל לגבי איתתא ואמר לה חמית דייתי חברי לגבך ואת מקיימת נביא בישראל.

i.e. "Ahab ben Qolaiah and Zedekiah ben Maaseiah were pretended prophets. And they used to commit adultery with their neighbours' wives, as it is written, Jer. xxix. 23. And what would they do? One of them went to a woman and said unto her, 'I have seen (in a vision) that my fellow will come unto thee, and that thou wilt raise up a prophet in Israel.'" The matter went on, until they attempted the queen in the same fashion, with the result mentioned above. Here we are at once struck with the strangeness of the implication that not only Jewesses, but even Babylonian ladies, even the queen, could be influenced by the promise of giving birth to a Jewish prophet. How are we to account for this transformation of the original tradition, which brings in Babylonian women instead of Jewesses? The reason, Brüll thinks, was probably genealogical. In the interests of purity of descent, the fact had to be suppressed that during the Babylonian Exile Jewish matrons had been misled into fornication. If the Haggada also told of an attempt upon a noble lady—say the wife of a former Jewish king—and this attempt led to the ruin of the perpetrators, the wife of Nebuchadnezzar was naturally substituted; and to make everything plausible, she was provided with a suitable name, Semiramis. And as the old tradition made the two miscreants promise the birth of the Messiah, and this could be no inducement to Babylonian women, this difficulty was got rid of by substituting prophet for Messiah. The Messianic reference, Brüll thinks, would have been pointless, unless made at a time when there was no representative of the House of David to whom such hopes could attach. This feature of the Haggada, therefore, agrees with the theory that the Joacim of Susanna is Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, the Jewish king who languished in prison throughout the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. A captive at the age of 18, he either had no children, or only such as "were made eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon." The situation was one which afforded free scope to pretenders of all sorts; and it is quite possible that Ahab and Zedekiah had higher designs than the mere gratification of lust in their attempt on Susanna. In the Midrash Wayyiqrā Rabbā, Par. xix., a story is told indicative of contemporary Jewish fears that the House of David might become extinct with Jehoiachin's death. The Great Sanhedrin is said to have sought and obtained, through the intercession of Queen Semiramis, permission for the wife of Jehoiachin to visit him in his prison. In the sequel of the story, which it is unnecessary to translate, the wife of Jeconiah appears as preserving her purity, according to Jewish ideas, under circumstances of great temptation: and she utters an exclamation, בישושנה אדומה ראיתי, which, curiously enough, contains the name of the heroine of our Apocryphon. Dr. Brüll supposes that this cry of hers gave rise to her popular designation; a supposition which he confirms by the fact that Susanna is not known as a Hebrew proper name of earlier date. (See Bk. of Jubilees, viii. 1.) And when she leaves her husband, she takes a bath of purification, which detail coincides with the fact that Susanna in the Apocryphon is about to take a bath when the Elders attack her. On these grounds, Brüll thinks, and we are disposed to agree with him, that the Susanna of our story is the king's wife in the Midrash. And this is borne out by other points of coincidence. Susanna was the wife of Joacim; and Joacim was the most prominent personage among the Exiles. The description only suits Jehoiachin-Jeconiah, the former king of Judah, who some twenty-five years after his imprisonment was restored by Evil-Merodach to kingly honours at the court of Babylon. In these changed circumstances we may be sure that the respect of his own countrymen would not be wanting; Jehoiachin would be regarded as the Prince of the Captivity, and would leave his dignity to his successors. It is beyond question, says Brüll, that the Babylonian Exilarchate, which reached in almost unbroken succession down to the second half of the 14th century, as also the Palestinian Patriarchate founded by Zerubbabel, originated in the position of honour accorded to king Jehoiachin. There is no difficulty in supposing a confusion of the names Jehoiachin and Jehoiakim such as occurs elsewhere: see S. Jerome's caution on this point ('Comm. in Dan.' i. 1). Moreover, S. Hippolytus identified Jehoiachin-Jeconiah with the Joacim of our work. See Georg. Syncell. Chronogr. 218: Ὁ ἱερὸς Ἱππόλυτος ἐν τῷ κατὰ τὴν Σωσαννὰν καὶ τὸν Δανιὴλ γράμματι τρία ἔτη λέγει τὸν υἱὸν Ἰωιακεὶμ Ἰωαχεὶμ τὸν καὶ Ἰεχονίαν μετὰ τὸν πατέρα κρατήσαντα μετακομισθῆναι εἰς Βαβυλῶνα σὺν τοῖς λοιποῖς ὡς πρόκειται. τὸν δὲ Δανιὴλ καὶ τοὺς τρεῖς παῖδας τῆς παρούσης αἰχμαλωσίας λέγει. Τοῦτον δὲ λέγει καὶ τῆς Σωσαννῆς ἄνδρα εἶναι· καὶ πιθανὸς ὁ λόγος. Africanus and Origen, in the correspondence referred to above, were of the same opinion, though the former suggests a possible difference. Upon the whole, then, it is highly probable that the Susanna of our story is the wife of king Jehoiachin, of whom the Midrash speaks. Amid whatever variations of outward form, an essential similarity has so far been established between the Greek History of Susanna and certain Haggadic passages in the Talmud and Midrash.

We have now to consider the intervention of Daniel, and his examination of the two false witnesses. In the Midrashic story, too, we see a third person intervening, whose moral rectitude shines out in vivid contrast with the turpitude of the two prophets, at the moment of their penal destruction. Joshua ben Josedech the High Priest is so far an adumbration of the Daniel of Susanna. But the conception of Daniel as a judge cross-questioning the witnesses is conspicuous by its absence from the Talmudic and Midrashic stories about the wicked prophets and about Susanna; that is to say, it is unknown to the popular tradition (Volkssage), and did not belong to the original story of Susanna. It is not, however, due to the mere fancy of the author; and as it, in fact, constitutes the kernel of the whole narrative, it deserves careful consideration. Now there happens to be preserved in the Mishna a fragmentary notice of an exactly similar examination of witnesses. In Sanhedr. 5, 2, it is written: מעשה שבדק בן זכאי בעוקצי תאנים, "Once upon a time Ben Zakkai put questions about fig-stems." Two other fragments of this old Halachah are quoted in Bab. Sanhedr. 41 A: אמרו לו תחת תאינה הרגו, "They said unto him, 'He slew him under a fig-tree.'" This informs us of the charge. אמר להן תאינה זו עוקציה דקין עוקציה גסין תאנים שחורות תאנים לבנות, "He said unto them, 'As to that fig-tree, were its stems thin or thick? were the figs dark or pale?'" This shews the nature of the cross-examination of the accusers. The deduction כל המרבה בבדיקות הרי זה משובח, "Whoso doeth much in cross-questioning witnesses, lo that man is to be praised," indicates that the cross-examination resulted in a disproof of the charge; so that the case is a complete parallel to the one before us. Here again, therefore, the proper conclusion seems to be that the author of Susanna has simply given another shape to pre-existing materials. What was his object in thus remodelling, combining, and enlarging the old popular traditions? The moral added in the LXX. text shews that it was early perceived that the aim of the piece was didactic, not historical. But the contrast between youth and age is too superficial. The contrast is between two kinds of criminal procedure, which are represented, not by a dry general description, but by a concrete instance of their actual working. The author's aim is to portray certain deplorable defects inherent in the administration of justice in his own time, and to suggest a radical cure.

Digitized by Microsoft®

The proofs are evident in the story itself. (1.) Ahab and Zedekiah, who elsewhere are lying prophets, or medical rogues, are here judges who bear false witness. (2.) Daniel too is a judge, though elsewhere he has nothing to do with things judicial. (3.) The entire action is mainly developed in the hall of judgment. (4.) The two references to Scripture which occur in the piece bear upon justice and its administrators (Exod. xxiii. 7; Zech. 5, 6, 8, 11). (5.) The indirect citation of the Pentateuchal law for punishing false witnesses with the same penalty that the accused would have suffered, would seem superfluous, if the author had not meant to shew that the application of the same was in place in the case he describes. (6.) The plan of the piece indicates that the traditions about the Babylonian false prophets and Susanna are merely the substructure for the representation of the examination of witnesses by which Susanna's innocence was established.

And here we may add another remarkable coincidence. Simon ben Shetach, the well-known President of the Sanhedrin, taught in words what Ben Zakkai taught by example. See Pirqê 'Abôth, i. 9:

שמעון בן שטח אומר הוי מרבה לחקור את העדים והוי זהיר בדבריך שמא מתוכם ילמדו לשקר׃

"Simon ben Shetach used to say, Examine the witnesses abundantly, and be cautious in thy words, lest they learn from them to give false answers." This saying appears to have been the fruit of bitter personal experience. Simon's own son is said to have been condemned to death, on the testimony of witnesses suborned by Simon's enemies. The witnesses confessed the truth just before the execution; but their victim refused to be tried again. "Father," said he, "if thou desirest that help come through thee, use me as a threshold." (Jerus. Sanhedr. vi. 3: אבא אם בקשת לבוא תישועה על ידך עשה אותי כאסקופה.) In other words, the son was willing to be a conspicuous example of the judicial abuse against which his father was agitating. About this time probably Ben Zakkai lived, who, as we have seen, instituted a more stringent process of inquiry; and the Story of Susanna may well be a product of the same period, intended to advocate the claims of this innovation in the practice of the courts, by a striking example of the miscarriage of justice under the old system, and of its complete vindication by the new method. But Simon ben Shetach was also the champion of another reform in connexion with the law of testimony. As the brother-in-law of king Alexander Jannæus (acc. 106 B.C.), he was able, after a long struggle, to secure the triumph of his party the Pharisees in the Sanhedrin, and of their principles in the administration of the law, over their opponents the Sadducees, who had been dominant under Hyrcanus and until the close of the reign of Jannai. According to Sadducean principles, they who had falsely accused a man of a capital crime were only put to death, if the sentence had already been executed on their victim. The legal aphorism, "life for life," was construed literally. The Pharisees, on the other hand, relying upon Deut. xix. 19, considered the intention of the accusers as equivalent to actual murder. According to them, the maxim "life for life" came into application as soon as, in consequence of the false depositions, sentence had been pronounced, although not yet carried out. The law at the time extraordinarily favoured informations. The witnesses, who were also the accusers, were only examined about the main fact, so that their falsehood could not easily become evident; and even if it did, they got off without punishment, though the accused had actually been executed.

This crying evil the Pharisaic party sought to remedy by the introduction of a more rigorous examination of witnesses, and by making the law more severe against false witnesses. The partiality and prejudice of the judges are attested by a saying of Judah ben Tabbai, the colleague of Simon ben Shetach; see Pirqê 'Abôth, i. 8. And, according to the Talmudic Sota 22 B, Jannai left his wife Salome the warning: "Be not afraid of the Pharisees, nor of those who are not Pharisees (i.e. the Sadducees); but (be afraid of) the painted ones, who look like the Pharisees, whose works are like the work of Zimri, and who seek the reward of Phinehas." The state of things thus indicated is mirrored in our Apocryphon. The two Elders are counterparts of the "painted ones." Susanna is treated as an adulteress, without examination of the witnesses. At the right moment, Daniel, the personified judgment of God, appears on the scene. He knows Susanna's innocence by inspiration; but he will shew the people how a Sanhedrin ought to ascertain the truth. Each of the witnesses must be questioned separately about the details of the charge. The Sadducean interpretation of the law would have let off the guilty Elders; but the Pharisaic principle is rigorously carried out in their execution.

From all this, it appears to be a highly probable conclusion that this Apocryphon is an Anti-Sadducean Tendenz-Schrift, in which not unskilfully the matter of an old tradition about the punishment of some seducers of women is worked up into an instructive picture of a certain period. Its aim was twofold: (1) To illustrate the utility of an investigation of particulars such as Ben Zakkai actually practised at the time; and (2) to accentuate the necessity of a rigorous punishment of false witnesses, independently of the question whether an accused person has suffered on the ground of their evidence, or not. The former point is especially prominent, as being distinctly an innovation. The fact that the son of Simon ben Shetach was obliged to submit to death in order to secure the punishment of his lying accusers, proves that the court which tried him consisted of members of the Sadducean party. This event, which probably occurred during the bloody struggles between the persecuted Pharisees and the Sadducees favoured by Jannai, between the years 94–89 B.C., must have roused popular indignation, and powerfully furthered Simon's projects of legal reform, and the ascendency of the Pharisaic party. It also called forth the History of Susanna. If this account of the origin and tendency of the work be accepted, it must evidently be regarded as a plant of Palestinian rather than Alexandrian growth. The primary language was probably neo-Hebrew. The Greek of Theodotion falls back easily into Hebrew, and that of the LXX., although somewhat more free, and variously interpolated, is essentially Hebraising. From Babylonia the original elements of the story passed to Judæa, and the Alexandrian translator and editor may have received it thence either in the shape of an oral or a written relation. It is true that we have no direct evidence from ancient times for the existence in Hebrew or Chaldee of the Story of Susanna as we know it. Nachmani, the only old Jewish writer who mentions it, quotes part of Judith i. 7, 8, 11 from the Peshito Syriac, with the reference כמו שכתוב במגלת שושן, "as it is written in the Roll of Shushan," i.e. probably Susanna. Perhaps he has not so much confused Judith with Susanna, as cited the former from a 'Book of Holy Women' in which the Story of Susanna came first.

In the Greek MSS. and common editions, the narrative is commonly given as Dan. i. So also in Old Lat. and Arab. Chronological propriety suggested this arrangement, as it purports to relate an episode of Daniel's youth. But as the place is Babylonia, and the time the Captivity, a better position would obviously have been after Dan. i. The LXX. text, the Vulgate, and the Complutensian edition, relegate the piece to the end of Daniel, as a mere addition or appendix to the canonical work (ch. xiii.). The Syro-Hexaplar also places it, along with Bel and the Dragon, at the end of the book, separating it from the canonical portion by the note, "Finished is Daniel according to the tradition of the Seventy," and by a further note relating to the Greek codex.

The two Greek texts, that of the LXX. and that of Theodotion, differ remarkably in the opening of the story. There are four Syriac texts, of which two appear in Walton.[1] The others known to the

[1] The remarkable additions and omissions of these texts may partly depend on traditions known to the translators, but long since lost.

Digitized by Microsoft®

writer are the Syro-Hexaplar, and a fourth text, of which Lagarde has given extracts in his 'Apocrypha Syriace.'[1]

The Syro-Hexaplar is from the LXX.; the rest apparently are based upon Theodotion's recension. In the LXX. text there is a strange lacuna at the outset, in which the context indicates that particulars relating to the two Elders must have been imparted. The words of Daniel to the two miscreants (vv. 52, 56) involve references to former misconduct not related in the existing mutilated narrative, but once probably communicated in the missing verses. Perhaps the omission was intentionally made by those who inserted the narrative in the Hagiographa, in order to avoid defaming the Jewesses of the Exile. Theodotion completed the truncated text by details about Susanna's family connexions, and this involved further changes. The expression "in that year" (v. 5) points to the existence of a chronological datum in what once preceded.

[1] These texts are indicated in the notes as Syr. W_1. and Syr. W_2. (the so-called Harklensian); Syr. H.; and Syr. L_2. I have used A. M. Ceriani's beautiful photo-lithograph of 'Codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus' (Milan, 1874), as well as Bugati (1788). This version was made at Alexandria, A.D. 617, according to the subscription, which runs thus: "Daniel according to the Seventy. Finished is the Book of Daniel the prophet, which has been interpreted from the tradition of the Seventy and Two, who in the days of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, before the coming of the Messiah a hundred years, more or less, interpreted the Holy Scriptures out of the Hebrew tongue into Greek, in Alexandria the great city. Now this book was interpreted also out of Greek into Syriac in the city Alexandria, in the month Kanûn Posterior of the year nine hundred and twenty-eight of Alexander, Fifth Indiction." It is an accurate rendering from the Greek, and contributes much to the restoration of the text.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE

HISTORY OF SUSANNA,

Set apart from the beginning of DANIEL, because it is not in the Hebrew, as neither the Narration of BEL and the DRAGON. ‖ Gr. Bel's dragon.

16 Two judges hide themselves in the garden of Susanna to have their pleasure of her: 28 which when they could not obtain, they accuse and cause her to be condemned for adultery: 46 but Daniel examineth the matter again, and findeth the two judges false.

THERE dwelt a man in Babylon, called Joacim:

2 And he took a wife, whose name was Susanna, the daughter of Chelcias, a very fair woman, and one that feared the Lord.

3 Her parents also were righteous, and taught their daughter according to the law of Moses.

4 Now Joacim was a great rich man, and had a fair garden joining Verses 1–5*a* belong to Theodotion, and Cod. Chisian. and Syr. H. have marked them as added to the LXX. from his text. Fritzsche thinks that the LXX. either began the story with v. 5, or that some such words as ἦσαν δὲ δύο πρεσβύτεροι ἐν Βαβυλῶνι have been lost in their text. But see the Introduction ad fin. Syr. W_2.: "When Daniel was twelve years old, there was a man whose name was Joacim, and he had a wife whose name was Shushan," &c.

1. Joacim.] Joacim, in the Gk. Ἰωακείμ, is of course the Heb. יהויקים or Jehoiakim. Cf. Judith iv. 6. Ammonius, Hippolytus, Syncellus, and many others have identified him with the king of Judah who was carried captive to Babylon and afterwards liberated: 2 Kings xxiv. 15; xxv. 27 sqq. Bugati's objection that this is to confuse יהויקים with יהויכין, Jehoiakim with Jehoiachin, does not hold: see 3 Esdr. i. 39, 43, and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 5, 9. Fritzsche observes that although Joacim is styled "more honourable than all others" (v. 4), his entire position in the story does not harmonize with the hypothesis that he was king; indeed, had he been so, it must have been expressly stated. But see the Introd.

2. Susanna, the daughter of Chelcias.] The majority of MSS. spell the first name Σουσάννα. Fritzsche notes that Cod. II. and others give Σωσάννα; and so Tischendorf has edited (LXX. Vat., 5th ed.): but Dr. Bissell says this is a mistake as regards Cod. II., which has Σουσάννα throughout. The name is a transliteration of שׁוֹשַׁנָּה (Šōšannā), "lily," which does not occur as a proper name in the O. T.; but see Luke viii. 3. This story of the woman who was both chaste and fair as a lily may have popularized the name. Shushan, Dan. viii. 2, the capital of Susiana, is obviously not an originally Heb. word. Chelcias, Gk. Χελκίας, is the Heb. חלקיה, "Hilkiah." So the Arab. and Syr. H. The common text (Walton, Lagarde) has חלכיה, which apparently confuses the name with Elkanah. The latter text makes him a priest, and relates that the synagogue met in the house of Joacim, and that Susanna lived in wedlock a few days only, and had spent the rest of her time as a pious widow. Compare the story of Judith. Hilkiah was a common priestly name: see 1 Chron. vi. 13, 45, ix. 11; Jer. i. 1; also 2 Kings xviii. 18, xxii. 8, 12.

a very fair woman, and one that feared the Lord.] The union of beauty with virtue, the ideal of womanhood, was realized in her. Verse 3, as Hippolytus notes, suggests the reason.

3. righteous.] δίκαιοι, צדיקים. As such, they "taught" (ἐδίδαξαν = had taught) their daughter, as the Law enjoined: Deut. iv. 9, 10; vi. 7, 20; Ex. xiii. 14.

4. a great rich man.] Lit., "very rich"—πλούσιος σφόδρα (Gen. xiii. 2). The term rendered "fair garden" is παράδεισος, the Gk. form of a word denoting in Persian a royal park or pleasure-ground. Xenophon brought the term into Gk. use: cf. 'Anab.' i. 2, 7; 'Cyrop.' i. 3, 12. Photius and Pollux state that the word is Persian. In Heb. it occurs in the form פַּרְדֵּס, pardēs, Cant. iv. 13; Eccl. ii. 5; Neh. ii. 8. The Vendidâd has it in the form pairidaêza, "enclosure," "park;" and in Armenian pardēz is "the garden round a house." Cf. the Syr. pardaisâ, "garden." The Old Lat. here has viridarium, "a plantation" or "pleasure-garden;" Vulg. pomarium, "orchard."

joining.] "Joining" is γειτνιῶν, "neighbour-

Digitized by Microsoft®

unto his house: and to him resorted the Jews; because he was more honourable than all others.

5 The same year were appointed two of the ancients of the people to be judges, such as the Lord spake of, that wickedness came from Babylon from ancient judges, who seemed to govern the people.

6 These kept much at Joacim's house: and all that had any suits in law came unto them.

ing:" see Job xxvi. 5 (Symmachus); 2 Macc. ix. 25.

resorted.] "Used to resort," προσήγοντο (Josh. vii. 17, 18). Συνήγ., the reading of Codd. 34, 36, 48, &c., is more usual in this sense. As a wealthy and influential man, Joacim was accustomed to receive numbers of his countrymen, and no doubt to dispense to them his advice and assistance in case of need. Syr. W_2. adds: "and the synagogue was in his house. And few days was Susanna with her husband, and the rest of her life was she in widowhood, and day and night in the service of the Lord was she occupied."

Julius Africanus objected to the statement of this verse, that it was incredible that Joacim could have been so rich and powerful in the Captivity. Origen rightly replied that the deported Jews were not all so plundered that none were left wealthy. Besides, we know that when they had had time to settle down in their new country, they soon began to prosper as merchants and traders, just as they have done in every other foreign land throughout the history of their dispersions. Comparatively few of the exiles availed themselves of Cyrus' permission to return to Judah. The great majority remained in their adopted country; and in the Roman times Babylonia and Mesopotamia were the home of vast communities of Jews, who possessed great wealth, and dwelt in strongly-fortified cities. Cf. Tobit i. 13, 14, 22.

5. The same year.] "In that year;" i.e., apparently, the year of Joacim's marriage, v. 2. For "ancients" or elders see note on Judith vi. 16. Cf. also Isa. iii. 14. It is clear from various passages of the O. T. that Israelite townships enjoyed a kind of municipal government under their own elders, who constituted the town council or γερουσία (senatus). Josephus, 'Ant.' iv. 8, ascribes to Moses the constitution of a council of seven elders or magistrates for each city. But see Ruth iv. 2, where ten elders of Bethlehem are spoken of. Grotius thinks that the two Elders of this story were appointed as assessors of the αἰχμαλωταρχὴς or ריש גלותא, the chief of the exiles. There is no reason to doubt that the scattered communities of the deported Jews were permitted, as in later times, to observe their own laws: cf. Esth. iii. 8. But it is hardly likely that their judges exercised the power of life and death, as v. 62 implies.

such as the Lord.] Rather, "of whom the Lord spake: Lawlessness hath gone forth from Babylon from elder-judges who were accounted to govern the people." The words purport to contain a direct reference to some prophetic utterance; and in form partly correspond with Jer. xxiii. 15: ἀπὸ τῶν προφητῶν Ἰερουσαλὴμ ἐξῆλθε μολυσμὸς πάσῃ τῇ γῇ. It is very probable, as Fritzsche observes, that the apparent quotation is really due to a reminiscence of Jer. xxix. 20–23. Jewish tradition, indeed, identifies the two Elders with the adulterous prophets Ahab and Zedekiah, "whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire." But the tradition may have grown out of Jeremiah's words, "Because they have committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives." The objection to it is that Ahab and Zedekiah were prophets, not elder-judges; they were burned alive by Nebuchadnezzar, whereas the two Elders were stoned by the Jews, according to the Law (v. 62. The LXX., however, says: ὁ ἄγγελος Κυρίου ἔῤῥιψε πῦρ διὰ μέσου αὐτῶν). Walton's Syr. 2 is unique in giving the names of the two Elders, Amid and Abid (not Anid, as Fuller); i.e., apparently, "Drowned" and "Lost."

As regards the words "who seemed to govern"—οἱ ἐδόκουν κυβερνᾶν—we may compare Mark x. 42 (see Matt. xx. 25); Luke xxii. 24; Gal. vi. 3, ii. 9 (οἱ δοκοῦντες στῦλοι εἶναι); 1 Cor. x. 12, vii. 40, xi. 16, xiv. 37. This seems better than to understand by the words that the Jews had only the shadow of self-government at the time. S. Jerome: "Qui injuste praesunt populo tantum nomen habent judicum: regere videntur populum magis quam regunt." (So Ammonius: ἐφαίνοντο γὰρ κυβερνῆσαι, καὶ εἰς ναυάγια ἐποίουν ἐμπεσεῖν τὰς ψυχάς.) Syr. W_L.: "who were ministering in the temple" (!). Syr. W_2.: "who are accounted heads of the people."

6. These kept much.] The Gk. verb is προσεκαρτέρουν; Vulg. frequentabant: see Num. xiii. 20; Acts i. 14, ii. 46. Render: "These would (or were wont to) abide . . . and all . . . would come."

and all that had any suits.] οἱ κρινόμενοι, litem agere; Job xxxv. 14, xiii. 19; Matt. v. 40; 1 Cor. vi. 6: ἀδελφὸς μετὰ ἀδελφοῦ κρίνεται. LXX.: "and suits (caussae) used to come from other towns unto them," viz. for hearing. Cf. Exod. xxii. 9; xxiv. 14.

7 Now when the people departed away at noon, Susanna went into her husband's garden to walk.

8 And the two elders saw her going in every day, and walking; so that their lust was inflamed toward her.

9 And they perverted their own mind, and turned away their eyes, that they might not look unto heaven, nor remember just judgments.

10 And albeit they both were wounded with her love, yet durst not one shew another his grief.

11 For they were ashamed to declare their lust, that they desired to have to do with her.

12 Yet they watched diligently from day to day to see her.

13 And the one said to the other, Let us now go home: for it is dinner time.

14 So when they were gone out,

7, 8. Now when the people departed away.] Lit. "And it came to pass (so also v. 19), when the people used to run away, Susanna would go in and walk about in her husband's garden. And the two elders used to watch her," &c. (The verbs are imperfects.) The LXX. uses ἀποτρέχειν, "to run off," as = Heb. הָלַךְ, abiit: Gen. xiii. 19. Syr. W_1. adds, "with her maidens;" Syr. W_2. omits the verse.

Instead of v. 8, Syr. W_2. has: "And these two heads of the people loved Susanna, without each other's knowledge; and desire of her beauty held them."

The LXX. text of these two verses runs thus: "These having seen a woman of a goodly countenance (ἀστείαν τῷ εἴδει: cf. Jud. viii. 7), wife of a brother (i.e. fellow-countryman; Exod. ii. 11. Heb. usage, Acts iii. 22) of theirs, one of the sons of Israel, by name (ὄνομα, as in Xen. 'Anab.' i. 2, 23, &c.; cf. Matt. xxvii. 57) Susanna, daughter of Chelcias, wife of Joacim, walking in her husband's garden at eventide (τὸ δειλινὸν, Lev. vi. 20; Exod. xxix. 39, 41; Gen. iii. 8; 1 Kings xviii. 29), and having desired her (Matt. v. 28) they perverted their own mind," &c. It is, in fact, evident from that part of this text which corresponds to v. 28 ap. Theod. that the Elders are not conceived as living in the same town as Joacim, and that Susanna's trial was held neither in his house nor even in his place of residence. Nor does the older text allege the fact that Joacim's house was a meeting-place for his fellow-countrymen as the occasion of the Elders seeing Susanna. It simply states that they did happen to see her walking in her husband's garden.

9. they perverted their own mind, &c.] Theod. has retained this verse from the older text.

turned away their eyes that they might not.] Cf. Dan. ix. 11: ἐξέκλιναν τοῦ μὴ ἀκοῦσαι τῆς φωνῆς σου. Contrast Dan. ix. 3: "I set my face unto the Lord God," &c.; and Ps. cxix. 37, Heb. xii. 2. The "just judgments" are those of Heaven against evil-doers. (Syr. W_2. adds "of God.") Cf. Ps. cxix. 120. The last clause clearly defines the preceding one more accurately; or else we might take the words in the sense of right decisions or resolves. See John ix. 39; Acts xxiv. 25; Ps. cxix. 75. There is something pictorial, too, in making these men look downwards, like the brute beasts whose example they were following. "Heaven," however, is doubtless here, as in Luke xv. 18, a metonym for God—cf. Dan. iv. 23—which became quite common in later Hebrew, e.g. in Maccabees, and the Mishna.

10, 11. And albeit they both.] Lit. "And they were both sorely pricked about her, and they declared not to one another their pain," &c. κατανενυγμένοι is "sore pricked," or "stung;" cf. Acts ii. 37, κατενύγησαν τῇ καρδίᾳ. But the words that follow seem to indicate that another meaning—that of stupefaction or silence—may be intended here: see Lev. x. 3; Isa. xlvii. 5; Ps. iv. 4; and especially Dan. x. 9, 15. For the sense of being stung with pain, remorse, &c., see Gen. xxxiv. 7; Ecclus. xii. 12, xiv. 1, xx. 21, xlvii. 20.

The Vulg. has: vulnerati amore ejus.

For vv. 10, 11, Syr. W_1. has: "And they both desired her, to be with her after the manner of women; and they revealed not their stroke, one to another, because they were wishing to be with her in secret." Syr. W_2.: "But they two were watching for her, and were wishing to disgrace her."

After the words, "And both were sorely pricked about her," the LXX. text continues: "and one to the other would not admit the evil (οὐ προσεποιεῖτο τὸ κακόν) which possessed them about her, nor did the woman know this matter." Οὐ προσεποιεῖτο, dissimulabat, i.e. made as if the thing were not so—masked or disguised his real state of feeling. (Thucyd. iii. 47. 3.)

12. Yet they watched diligently.] "And they kept close and rival watch" (παρετηροῦσαν φιλοτίμως). For the form of the aorist, see εἶδοσαν, v. 18; ἐξῆλθοσαν, v. 19; ἐκλαίοσαν, v. 33 in LXX.; ὡμίλουσαν, v. 57. At the end, Syr. W_2. rightly adds: "alone."

13. And the one said.] Something seems to have fallen out of the text. Syr. W_2. fills they parted one from the other, and turning back again they came to the same place; and after that they had asked one another the cause, they acknowledged their lust: then appointed they a time both together, when they might find her alone.

Digitized by Microsoft®

15 And it fell out, as they watched a fit time, she went in ‖as before with two maids only, and she was desirous to wash herself in the garden: for it was hot.

Gr. as esterday nd the ay efore.

16 And there was no body there save the two elders, that had hid themselves, and watched her.

17 Then she said to her maids, Bring me oil and washing balls, and shut the garden doors, that I may wash me.

18 And they did as she bade them, and shut the garden doors, and went out themselves at ‖privy doors to fetch the things that she had commanded them: but they saw not the elders, because they were hid.

‖ Or, side doors.

19 Now when the maids were gone forth, the two elders rose up, and ran unto her, saying,

20 Behold, the garden doors are shut, that no man can see us, and up the apparent lacuna thus: "Now it happened one day, when the assembly broke up, they were waiting to see her when she entered the garden, and they parted not the one from his fellow." Then follows v. 13.

Instead of vv. 12–21, the LXX. has: "And when it was early morning (i.e. on the day of the elders' wicked attempt), they tried to steal a march on each other, making haste to see which would present himself to her first, and address her (ἐρχόμενοι ἔκλεπτον ἀλλήλους σπεύδοντες, τίς φανήσεται αὐτῇ πρότερος κ.τ.λ. Cf. Mark xvi. 9). And, behold, she, according to her custom, was walking about, and the one of the elders was come; and, behold, the other arrived, and one questioned the other, saying, Why wentest thou forth thus at early morning by thyself, without taking (Matt. iv. 5) me along with thee? And they fully confessed to one another each his pain. And one said to the other, Let us go unto her; and having agreed (συνθέμενοι), they came to her, and began to press her hard (ἐξεβιάζοντο αὐτήν, Ps. xxxviii. 12; Wisd. xiv. 19; Esth. vii. 8 (B)). And the Jewess said to them," &c. (v. 22).

14. asked one another.] Ἀνετάζοντες ἀλλήλους τὴν αἰτίαν. The rare ἀνετάζειν (here used c. dupl. acc.) occurs Judges vi. 29 (Alex.), where the Vatic. MS. has the common ἐπιζητεῖν, and in Acts xxii. 24, 29, in the sense of questioning a man by torture.

The Syriac texts vary much from the other versions and from each other in this verse.

appointed they a time.] Συνετάξαντο καιρόν. For the verb, see Polyb. ix. 17. 1; Job ii. 11 (varr.). "Both together" is κοινῇ (Codd. 34, 230, 245 add γνώμῃ): Ecclus. xviii. 1.

15. as they watched a fit time.] See v. 12 for the verb. With ἡμέραν εὔθετον cf. ἐν καιρῷ εὐθέτῳ, Ps. xxxii. 6 (Heb. "at a time of finding").

she went in as before.] Lit., "she went in once, as yesterday and the day before;" i.e. as aforetime (εἰσῆλθέ ποτε καθὼς χθὲς καὶ τρίτης ἡμέρας. Codd. XII. 26, 34, τρίτην ἡμέραν, which is the more usual Gk. form of this common Hebrew phrase. See Gen. xxxi. 2; Exod. v. 7, 14; Josh. iv. 18. Homer's χθιζά τε καὶ πρωϊζά, and the Attic ἐχθὲς καὶ πρώην, are similar). Syr. W_2.: "according to the custom she had."

16. that had hid themselves, and watched her.] "In hiding, and watching her closely;" like evil beasts biding their time for a spring. The verb is παρατηρέω, which is almost equivalent to insidiari: see vv. 12, 15, supra. Syr. W_2. calls them "chiefs of the synagogue."

17. washing balls.] Gk. σμήγματα (III. 23, 26, al. σμῆγμα). The more Attic form is σμῆμα. In the LXX. (Esth. ii. 3, 9, 12) the word renders Heb. תַּמְרוּקִים, abstersiones, a term denoting the cleansing of the person by means of cosmetics, which was customary on reception into the harem. Here, too, the sense seems to be the same, viz. perfumed unguents, cosmetics, rather than soap (Jer. ii. 22). Syr. W_1. has ܫܡܡܐ, the same word (σμῆμα) apparently; Syr. W_2. ܐܫܢ, which is said to mean the herb alkali. Fritzsche refers to Athenaeus and Galen for proof that the Greek term was used in three senses: (1) soap; (2) perfumes; (3) in medical writers, vegetable saps, and ointments.

Susanna wanted the oil and cosmetics for use after, not before or in, the bath.

18. shut.] "Shut fast" (ἀπέκλεισαν).

at privy doors.] "By the side doors"—κατὰ τὰς πλαγίας θύρας. Vulg. per posticum, "through a back door." Arab.: "side doors."

because.] Rather, "that." The construction is like that of Gen. i. 4; Exod. ii. 2.

19. ran unto her.] "Ran upon her," in the sense of assault: see 1 Macc. vi. 45.

Digitized by Microsoft®

we are in love with thee: therefore consent unto us, and lie with us.

21 If thou wilt not, we will bear witness against thee, that a young man was with thee: and therefore thou didst send away thy maids from thee.

22 Then Susanna sighed, and said, I am straitened on every side: for if I do this thing, it is death unto me: and if I do it not, I cannot escape your hands.

23 It is better for me to fall into your hands, and not do it, than to sin in the sight of the Lord.

24 With that Susanna cried with a loud voice: and the two elders cried out against her.

25 Then ran the one, and opened the garden door.

26 So when the servants of the house heard the cry in the garden, they rushed in at a privy door, to see what was done unto her.

27 But when the elders had declared their matter, the servants were greatly ashamed: for there was never such a report made of Susanna.

28 And it came to pass the next day, when the people were assembled

20, 21. consent unto us.] συγκατάθου ἡμῖν. Cf. Exod. xxiii. 1, 32; Luke xxiii. 51. Old Lat. consenti nobis. For the following phrase (Gk. γενοῦ μεθ' ἡμῶν), see Gen. xxxix. 10; 2 Sam. xiii. 20; Tobit iii. 8; and v. 54 infra (LXX. text). Having resolved on the deed, these Elders and these Judges make no scruple about words. Cf. the scene in which Angelo declares his purpose to Isabel, 'Measure for Measure,' Act ii. sc. 4, towards the end:

"I have begun;
And now I give my sensual race the rein:
Fit thy consent to my sharp appetite.
* * * *
As for you,
Say what you can, my false o'erweighs your true."

22. sighed.] Or, "groaned aloud" (ἀνεστέναξε). Cf. Lam. i. 4; Eccles. xxv. 18.

I am straitened on every side.] For this phrase—στενά μοι πάντοθεν—see 2 Sam. xxiv. 14 (1 Chron. xxi. 13), where it is used by David. It expresses the sense of a dilemma. Susanna felt her choice restricted to two alternatives, either of which would destroy her. If she yielded, she would be liable to death as an unfaithful wife (Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22; John viii. 5); and if she refused, false witness would bring about the same result, and upon the same ground. She does not, like Shakspere's Isabel, in the first moments of surprise and indignation at the discovery of their shameful purpose, break out into threats of exposure. The lamb knows itself in the power of the wolves.

Old Lat. angustiae mihi undique. The phrase is wanting in the LXX. text, where Susanna's words begin: "I know that if I do this thing," &c., as in Theod. After "it is death to me," Syr. W_1.: "because I (shall) have dishonoured my husband Joacim's bed; and if I do it not, I shall receive an evil death at your hands, with an evil name that beseemeth not my rank; and shame I shall leave to all my family, from the false witness of wicked men, who add to the breach and evil of Israel with derision among the strange peoples."

23. It is better.] Compare Joseph's reply to his tempter, Gen. xxxix. 9; and David's words, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14.

S. Jerome objects, that to say continency is better is to allow some sort of goodness to the sin itself. But the comparison is not here instituted of the morality of the actions, but of the danger attending them; in other words, she argues that it is better to suffer a temporal than an eternal punishment.

24–27. These details are wanting in the text of the LXX. and in Syr. H. Theodotion has developed the story considerably.

24. cried out against her.] "Over against her;" "before her." Gk. κατέναντι αὐτῆς. Vulg. adversus eam. It is the Heb. נגד, לנגד, or לפני; the Chaldee לקבל, Dan. v. 1. (So Syr.)

25. Then ran the one.] Lit. "and the one ran and opened the doors:" nempe quasi adulterum persequens, as Grotius rightly explains.

26. the servants of the house.] οἱ ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας. A well-known idiom, expressing in brief that the servants in the house rushed out from the house. Syr.: "sons of the house."

rushed in at a privy door.] "Leaped in through the side door," or "postern." Cf. v. 18 supra; Gen. vi. 16: τὴν δὲ θύραν τῆς κιβωτοῦ ποιήσεις ἐκ πλαγίων. For the verb, Amos v. 19.

27. declared their matter.] "Spoken their words;" i.e. their accusation of Susanna, which Syr. W_1. gives at length, beginning: "It happened, as we were passing by outside of the

Digitized by Microsoft®

to her husband Joacim, the two elders came also full of mischievous imagination against Susanna to put her to death;

29 And said before the people, Send for Susanna, the daughter of Chelcias, Joacim's wife. And so they sent.

30 So she came with her father and mother, her children, and all her kindred.

31 Now Susanna was a very delicate woman, and beauteous to behold.

32 And these wicked men commanded to uncover her face, (for she was covered) that they might be filled with her beauty.

33 Therefore her friends and all that saw her wept.

34 Then the two elders stood up in the midst of the people, and laid their hands upon her head.

35 And she weeping looked up toward heaven: for her heart trusted in the Lord.

36 And the elders said, As we garden, we looked over to see the garden, and we saw Susanna," &c. The italicized words do not agree with vv. 36, 38 infra. Syr. W_2. is briefer: "Susanna has committed adultery, and we caught her with a young man in the garden." At the end it adds: "And they threw chains upon Susanna, and she was in the house of ward three days." The confusion of the slaves, and the reason assigned for it, is a natural touch. Had their mistress been subject to ill report, they would hardly have been so strongly affected in the present instance.

28. full of mischievous imagination.] "Full of their (τῆς) lawless (i.e. iniquitous) intent." They sat as judges frequently in Joacim's house: vv. 4, 5 supra. (Syr. W_1. adds the purpose of the assembly: "to inquire concerning Susanna; that if she had indeed done this uncleanness . . . she might be put to death.") The two miscreants determined to destroy Susanna, not only to protect themselves from possible consequences of their villany, but also because foiled passion is apt to turn to deadly hate. The cool audacity of their behaviour reminds us again of Shakspere's Angelo:

"'Tis not impossible
But one, the wicked'st caitiff on the ground,
May seem as shy, as grave, as just, as absolute,
As Angelo; even so may Angelo,
In all his dressings, characts, titles, forms,
Be an arch-villain."

After the words of Susanna (v. 23), the LXX. proceeds thus: "But the men of Belial (οἱ παράνομοι ἄνδρες, Deut. xiii. 13; 1 Macc. i. 12, 36; Wisd. iii. 16) departed, threatening in themselves (Gen. xxvii. 42), and plotting (ἐνεδρεύοντες, Ecclus. xi. 31. Hesych. explains, δόλον μηχανᾶται), that they might put her to death; and they came to the synagogue of the city where they were dwelling, and they who were there, all the sons of Israel, held a council (συνήδρευσαν). And the two elders and judges stood up, and said, Send for Susanna, &c. (v. 29), and straightway they called her."

29. Send for . . . so they sent.] Ἀποστέλλω ἐπί τινα in this sense is rare: Deut. xxviii. 8; 2 Chron. xxx. 1; Neh. vi. 3.

31. very delicate.] τρυφερὰ σφόδρα. The word is here used in a good sense, of personal beauty: cf. Deut. xxviii. 54, 56. Often it means "voluptuous," "luxurious," "effeminate:" Isa. xlvii. 1, 8. Syr. W_1. adds: "and she was gentler than all women, and her attire was very sober"

32. commanded to uncover her face.] Or, "that she be unveiled:" see Num. v. 18 (LXX.). The act was according to law, but the Elders had another motive, as the verse declares. The LXX. text states this even more plainly: ἵνα ἐμπλησθῶσι ἐπιθυμίας κάλλους αὐτῆς (so Syr. H. and W_2.). To strip off the veil was to treat her as a common courtesan.

33. her friends and all that saw her.] "Now her friends (οἱ παρ' αὐτῆς, Xen. 'Anab.' i. 1, 5), and all who saw (XII. 23, et multi; εἰδότες, 'knew:' LXX. ὅσοι ᾔδεισαν, Dan. vi. 5, 8; Mark i. 34; Vulg. qui noverant) her were weeping" (or, "began to weep," at the sight of the degradation done to her). In the LXX. v. 30 runs thus: "Now when the woman arrived with her father and mother, her men-servants also and her maids, being in number five hundred, arrived, and the four children (παιδία) of Susanna." Syr. H. also gives the number 500 (not "fifty," as Fuller).

34. laid their hands upon her head.] The symbolical act which the law prescribed for witnesses in criminal cases. See Lev. xxiv. 14; Deut. xiii. 9, xvii. 7; Acts vii. 58. Dr. Bissell wrongly refers to lifting up the hand as a sign of adjuration (Gen. xiv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 40). The LXX. text is: "But the elders and judges (see vv. 29, 41: their usual designation. On the present occasion they were witnesses, not judges) stood up and laid their hands upon her head."

35. looked up toward heaven.] At the moment when the accusers laid their hands upon her head. Comp. Matt. xiv. 19; Luke ix. 16; walked in the garden alone, this woman came in with two maids, and shut the garden doors, and sent the maids away.

Digitized by Microsoft®

37 Then a young man, who there was hid, came unto her, and lay with her.

38 Then we that stood in a corner of the garden, seeing this wickedness, ran unto them.

39 And when we saw them together, the man we could not hold: for he was stronger than we, and opened the door, and leaped out.

40 But having taken this woman, we asked who the young man was, but she would not tell us: these things do we testify.

41 Then the assembly believed them, as those that were the elders and judges of the people: so they condemned her to death.

42 Then Susanna cried out with a loud voice, and said, O everlasting God, thou knowest the secrets, and knowest all things before they be:

43 Thou knowest that they have borne false witness against me, and, behold, I must die; whereas I never did such things as these men have maliciously invented against me.

44 And the Lord heard her voice.

Mark vi. 41, vii. 34; and contrast v. 9 supra. The upward look referred the cause to a higher tribunal, and expressed entire confidence in its righteous dealing. The lesson taught is essentially the same as that of Dan. iii. 17, 18; vi. 16, 22.

The LXX. gives the verse thus: "But her heart was trusting upon the Lord her God, and having thrown her head back (ἀνακύψασα=ἀνέβλεψεν εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, Theod.) she wept in herself, saying, O Lord, the eternal God," &c. (v. 42). Fritzsche, after Bugati, inserts τρὶς before the participle, remarking, "non legitur in c. Chis. sed habet Syr. B." But the Syriac word wrongly rendered τρὶς by Bugati means "she lifted up" (ܩܡ).

37. The meaning of ἀνέπεσε (μετ' αὐτῆς) is not noticed in the last ed. of Liddell and Scott. Vulg. concubuit cum ea. The usual meaning of the word is "to recline at table," like ἀνακεῖμαι: Tobit ii. 1; Judith xii. 15; Ecclus. xxxii. 1. In Gen. xlix. 9, however, the word is used of "lying down to sleep"—ἀναπεσὼν ἐκοιμήθη ὡς λέων.

39. hold.] Lit., "get the mastery of," ἐγκρατεῖς γενέσθαι. The phrase occurs 2 Macc. viii. 30, x. 17, xiii. 13; Ecclus. vi. 27. Cod. III. reads περικρατεῖς; see Acts xxvii. 16, περικρ. γενέσθαι τῆς σκάφης. For the next phrase, cf. Exod. i. 9.

40. having taken this woman.] "Having laid hold of her;" ἐπιλαβόμενοι ταύτης: cf. Judges xii. 6; xvi. 3, 21; xix. 25, 29; Isa. iv. 1.

41. Then the assembly.] Lit., "And the synagogue believed them, as elders of the people and judges" (Syr. W_2.: "chiefs of the priests"). The elders had the same advantage over Susanna, as Angelo over Isabel in the play. See 'Meas. for Meas.,' Act ii. sc. 4, where Angelo demands:

"Who will believe thee, Isabel?
My unsoiled name, the austereness of my life,
My vouch against you, and my place i' the state,
Will so your accusation overweigh,
That you shall stifle in your own report,
And smell of calumny."

they condemned her to death.] Κατέκριναν αὐτὴν ἀποθανεῖν, "they gave sentence that she be put to death:" the absolute use of the verb, as in Mark xiv. 64. Cf. Esth. ii. 1.

Syr. W_2. adds: "saying, Whoso committeth adultery is worthy of death, and to be stoned with stones. And the ninth hour was Susanna delivered up, to be cast down from the place whence adulteresses are thrown headlong, and many were gathered together to behold it."

42. O everlasting God.] Ὁ Θεὸς ὁ αἰώνιος. Isa. xxvi. 4, ὁ Θεὸς ὁ μέγας ὁ αἰώνιος; Gen. xxi. 33. Compare also Dan. iii. 34, iv. 31, vii. 14, 27; Gen. ix. 16; Exod. xii. 14; Mic. ii. 9. The term αἰώνιος, applied to the mountains, to the divine covenant with Abraham and his seed, to the Mosaic institutions, to the kingdom of the Messiah, to the Deity himself, denotes "age-long," "enduring," "perpetual." Sometimes the meaning falls very far short of "everlasting," "eternal," in our stricter sense of the words: e.g. Prov. xxii. 28, xxiii. 10; Isa. lxi. 4, lxiii. 11; Job xl. 23: where "immemorial," "ancient," "permanent," sufficiently express it.

that knowest the secrets.] Ὁ τῶν κρυπτῶν γνώστης (not in LXX.). In 2 Kings xxi. 6, and elsewhere, γνώστης is "a wizard." With its use in the present passage, cf. the epithet καρδιογνώστης, Acts i. 24, xv. 8 (so Syr. W_2. here); and Deut. xxix. 29, "The secret things (τὰ κρυπτὰ) belong unto the Lord our God." In Dan. ii. 29, 47, God is called ὁ ἀποκαλύπτων μυστήρια, "He that revealeth mysteries."

43. maliciously invented.] Ἐπονηρεύσαντο

Digitized by Microsoft®

45 Therefore when she was led to be put to death, the Lord raised up the holy spirit of a young youth, whose name was Daniel:

46 Who cried with a loud voice, [a] I am clear from the blood of this woman.

47 Then all the people turned them toward him, and said, What mean these words that thou hast spoken?

48 So he standing in the midst of them said, Are ye such fools, ye sons of Israel, that without examination or knowledge of the truth ye have condemned a daughter of Israel?

[a] Matt. 27. 24.

κατ' ἐμοῦ. Cf. v. 62; Gen. xxxvii. 18 (=they were plotting to kill him); Deut. xix. 19 (זמם). See also 1 Chron. xvi. 22, καὶ ἐν τοῖς προφήταις μου μὴ πονηρεύεσθε. Old Lat. Quae hi maligni finxerunt adversum me; Vulg. Quae isti malitiose composuerunt adv. me.

The LXX. text now gives the formal accusation of the Elders: "But the two elders said, We were walking in her husband's garden, and as we rounded the course (κυκλοῦντες τὸ στάδιον) we saw this woman reposing (ἀναπαυομένην) with a man, and we stopped and were watching them dealing with one another. And they did not know that we were standing (there). Then we made agreement (συνειπάμεθα, Dan. ii. 9) with one another, saying, Let us learn who they are. And we approached and recognised her; but the young man fled in disguise (or muffled up, συγκεκαλυμμένος, 1 Sam. xxviii. 8; 1 Kings xxii. 30). But having laid hold of this woman," &c. (v. 40). "And all the synagogue believed them, as being elders, and judges of the people (ὡς πρεσβυτέρων ὄντων κ.τ.λ.)." Then follows, instead of Susanna's appeal to Heaven, which has already been given, a verse corresponding to (Theodotion's) v. 45: "And behold, an angel of the Lord, as she was being led forth to perish,—and the angel gave, as he was commanded, a spirit of understanding to one yet a youth (νεωτέρῳ ὄντι, Jud. viii. 20; Ps. cxlviii. 12), Daniel."

45. the Lord raised up the holy spirit of a young youth.] Rather, "God roused (or woke) the holy spirit of a young boy." According to the LXX., this was done through the instrumentality of an angel, who gave Daniel "a spirit of understanding" (πνεῦμα συνέσεως, Isa. xi. 2; Deut. xxxiv. 9), i.e. a power to discern the true relations of things. Theodotion modified this statement, as not consistent with Dan. iv. 9, 18; v. 11: according to which passages Daniel was endowed with "the spirit of the holy gods;" in virtue of which no secret was hidden from him. The account of the LXX. is, however, consistent with such passages as Dan. ix. 21; x. 5 sqq., in which the angel Gabriel communes with Daniel. (Syr. W_1.: "And God stirred up his Holy Spirit in Daniel, a youth;" W_2.: "And straightway the Holy Spirit abode upon young Daniel, who was twelve years old.")

46. I am clear.] Gk. ἀθῶος ἐγὼ ἀπό, which is equivalent to Heb. אני נקי מן: see Gen. xxiv. 41; Num. v. 19; and cf. Matt. xxvii. 24 (the cry of Pilate). Codd. III., XII., 23, al. have the synonymous καθαρὸς, "pure"= טהור מן, Job xiv. 4; cf. Acts xx. 26. So Old Lat. and Vulg. mundus. The impulse under which the holy youth proclaimed aloud that he would be no partner in the wrong that was about to be done is fittingly ascribed to an inspiration from above. The potency of his witness must, of course, be considered from an ethical and religious rather than from a strictly historical standpoint. In the latter case, the thing may appear wholly improbable; in the former, it is a good illustration of the Psalmist's words: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, because of thine adversaries; that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger." This verse is not in the LXX., which continues the narrative thus, after the passage translated above: "But Daniel having put asunder (διαστείλας) the crowd, and taken his stand in the midst of them, said," &c. (as in v. 48, save that for κατεκρίνατε, "ye have condemned," the reading is ἀπεκτείνατε, "ye have killed"—a more graphic expression). "And now put them me asunder one far from another, that I may examine (ἐτάσω) them. But when they had been put asunder, Daniel said to the synagogue, Now regard it not that these are elders, saying, They will never lie; but I will interrogate (ἀνακρινῶ, Thucyd. i. 95) them, according to what things occur to me" (κατὰ τὰ ὑποπίπτοντά μοι. Cf. Polyb. i. 68. 3; xx. 9, 10). Syr. H., "according as it appears to me."

48. standing in the midst.] Or, "having taken his stand in the midst." Cf. 2 Chron. vi. 12; 1 Kings viii. 22.

Are ye such fools, ye sons of Israel.] Before this question, Syr. W_2. interpolates: "And when Daniel had risen amongst them, he prophesied and said: 'Hear ye the word of the Lord, and hearken to the voice of his prophet! and condemn not the innocent in the righteous judgment of God. Judge the judgment of truth, that the Lord send not upon you the heat of his anger; for fearful is 49 Return again to the place of judgment: for they have borne false witness against her.

50 Wherefore all the people turned again in haste, and the elders said unto him, Come, sit down among us, and shew it us, seeing God hath given thee the honour of an elder.

51 Then said Daniel unto them, Put these two aside one far from another, and I will examine them.

52 So when they were put asunder one from another, he called one of them, and said unto him, O thou that art waxen old in wickedness, now thy sins which thou hast committed aforetime are come to light:

53 For thou hast pronounced false its stroke (Ecclus. xxiii. 11), and ye cannot bear it.'" It omits v. 49.

49. place of judgment.] Or, "tribunal." Τὸ κριτήριον is so used in Plat. 'Laws,' 767 B; Polyb. ix. 33. 12. See Dan. vii. 10, 26; Exod. xxi. 6; Judges v. 10; James ii. 6.

they have borne false witness.] The emphasis lies on the word "false." Daniel's positiveness is natural, on the assumption that he was guided in the manner stated, v. 45 supra. This also explains the sudden revulsion of popular feeling caused by his words (v. 50).

50. the elders said.] Hardly the two culprits; but other elders of the people, who would naturally preside over an inquiry in which the conduct of the two who had been appointed judges was called in question. This seems clear from Daniel's reply, v. 51: "And Daniel said unto them (i.e. to the presiding elders), Put these two (the criminals) asunder, one far from another." Besides, it is not to be supposed that when, at Daniel's bidding, the people returned to the place of judgment to reconsider the case, they would suffer the very persons whom Daniel accused to sit in judgment on their own cause. Walton's Syr. texts, however, have "those two elders," "those rulers of the synagogue;" and the Arabic has "the two sheikhs." Syr. W_2. adds: "And they brought a throne out of the treasury, and set it up (Dan. vii. 9) for Daniel to sit upon; and Daniel began to judge those wicked judges. Then they released Susanna. And Daniel said: 'I will not judge Susanna sitting, but standing on my feet.'" seeing God hath given.] Lit., "because to thee hath God given the eldership." This seems to imply that Daniel was already known as a subject of inspiration. But perhaps it is better to understand the words as an inference from the words he had just spoken and their magical effect upon the minds of the people. Cf. also Num. xi. 24–30. Any indication of the will of the Invisible King was sufficient in the Theocracy to supersede the operation of ordinary rules and restrictions: the theory being that the Divine Sovereign chose His own ministers when and how and whence He pleased. The term τὸ πρεσβεῖον denotes "age," Ps. lxxi. 18; and then the respect or honour which naturally belongs to age, the privilege of age: Demosth. 1003. 10; Gen. xliii. 33, ὁ πρωτότοκος κατὰ τὰ πρεσβεῖα αὐτοῦ. Here the function of judging is chiefly in view. Vulg. honorem senectutis. Codd. III., 35, 36, &c. read πρεσβυτέρων, a term which first occurs in the N.T., and always bears the sense of "a senate" or "college of elders;" e.g. Luke xxii. 66. In ecclesiastical writers it denotes the office of a presbyter.

52. O thou that art waxen old in wickedness.] Gk. πεπαλαιωμένε ἡμερῶν κακῶν, "aged (or grown hoar) in evil days." The genitive is relative: cf. Dan. vii. 22, ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμερῶν, "the Ancient of (i.e. in respect of) Days."

The LXX. text runs thus: "And he called the one of them, and they brought the elder to the younger, and Daniel said unto him: Hearken, hearken, O thou that art waxen old," &c. (53), "when thou wert trusted with hearing and judging capital cases (κρίνειν κρίσεις θάνατον ἐπιφερούσας), and the innocent thou didst condemn, but the guilty (ἐνόχους, Mark xiv. 64) thou usedst to let go (ἠφίεις, Mark i. 34), though the Lord said," &c., as below.

now thy sins which thou hast committed.] Lit., "now are come (ἥκασιν = ἥκουσιν) thy sins, which thou usedst to commit aforetime" (ἐποίεις τὸ πρότερον). The term ἥκασιν does not mean "are come to light" (Schleusner's patefiunt), but rather, "are come home to thee;" thy present miserable situation is the consequence, as it is the climax, of a life of sin. There is nothing unreal in this assertion. The deliberate and flagrant wrong of which this Elder had just been guilty, using the sanctity of office for a cloke of malignity and lust, could not be interpreted as a sudden and unaccountable aberration of conduct. It rather was an index of a corrupt character, whose principle was selfish advantage, and whose practice judicial injustice. But we must not forget that the invective of the youthful speaker is supposed to be divinely prompted (v. 45), and his insight into fact inspired.

It is curious that the Syriac versions get rid of the quotation (Syr. W_1.: "And the judgment, and hast condemned the innocent, and hast let the guilty go [b] Exod. 23. 7. free; albeit the Lord saith, [b]The innocent and righteous shalt thou not slay.

Digitized by Microsoft®

54 Now then, if thou hast seen her, tell me, Under what tree sawest thou them companying together? Who answered, Under a [‖] Gr. lentisk tree. [‖]mastick tree.

55 And Daniel said, Very well; thou hast lied against thine own head; for even now the angel of God hath received the sentence of God to cut thee in two.

56 So he put him aside, and commanded to bring the other, and said unto him, O thou seed of Chanaan, and not of Juda, beauty hath deceived thee, and lust hath perverted thine heart.

57 Thus have ye dealt with the Lord is righteous and innocent;" Syr. W_2. omits).

54. Now then, if thou hast seen her.] The emphasis is on her: "Now then, if her thou sawest." His conviction of her innocence is absolute. LXX.: "Now then, under what tree and at what sort of (ποταπῷ = ποίῳ, Mark xiii. 1) place of the garden hast thou seen (ἑώρακας) them together? (ὄντας σὺν ἑαυτοῖς). And the impious one (ἀσεβὴς) said, Under a mastick tree."

mastick tree.] See the margin. The σχῖνος is the Pistacia lentiscus of Linnæus: see Pliny, 'Hist. Nat.' xiv. 20, xv. 6, xxiv. 6, &c. This tree or shrub yielded a resin or gum which was much used, and oil also was prepared from its berries. See further Dioscor. i. 50; Hdt. iv. 177. Of the versions Old Lat. rightly gives lentiscus; Vulg. and Syr. H. keep the Greek word; Syr. W_1. has "terebinth;" W_2. and L_2. have "pistachio-tree." Mastick is the odoriferous gum of the tree (Gk. μαστίχη).

55. Very well; thou hast lied against thine own head.] Rather, "Well hast thou lied against (εἰς, Luke xii. 10) thine own head" (i.e. thyself, thy person, Gen. xl. 13; 1 Sam. xxviii. 2; 2 Sam. i. 16; Prov. x. 6; Dan. i. 10). LXX. "against thine own soul." In Heb. "soul" (נפשׁ) is a common periphrasis for "self." Cf. also Acts v. 3, 4. The "well" (ὀρθῶς = εὖ) is ironical.

for even now the angel of God.] "For presently will an angel, having received God's sentence (or bidding) from God, cleave thee asunder" (cf. Matt. xxiv. 51). So, according to Fritzsche's text. Codd. III., XII., 26, al., order the words differently: "for presently will an angel of God, having received a sentence from God," &c. Φάσις (from φημὶ) is "judgment," "sentence," not "apparition" (from φαίνω), as Tromm gives it. See Acts xxi. 31. Old Lat. praeceptum; Vulg. sententia. LXX.: "For the angel of the Lord will cleave thy soul (i.e. according to Heb. use, "thyself," "thee") to-day." Cf. Luke ii. 35: "A sword shall pierce through thine own soul (thyself) also." There is a paronomasia in the Greek, or play on the assonance between the words σχῖνος, "mastick-tree," and σχίσει, "will cleave thee;" and a similar one in vv. 58, 59, on πρῖνος, "a holm-tree," and the verb πρίσαι, "to cut (saw) thee." Such a conceit may seem to us far-fetched and inappropriate; but the Oriental mind delights in such lusus verborum, and the peculiar force of many passages of the Hebrew prophets is lost in our version, because they have not been preserved in translation. See, for instance, Isa. v. 7; Mic. i. 10–15. In the present case, the Vulgate has: "Sub schino—Ecce enim Angelus Dei scindet te medium." But it neglects the paronomasia in vv. 58, 59. Luther imitates thus: "'Unter einer Linden.'—Der Engel des Herrn wird dich finden. 'Unter einer Eichen.'—Der Engel des Herrn wird dich zeichen." In English we might write: "'Under a clove-tree.'—For presently will an angel . . . cleave thee asunder. 'Under a yew.'—The angel will hew thee asunder." The cleaving and sawing of the text are, of course, metaphorical, and the terms used are conditioned by the necessities of the paronomasia. The legal punishment was death by stoning. See note on v. 62 infra.

56. seed of Chanaan, and not of Juda.] If character were the criterion of race, then this Elder belonged to the nations that were extirpated for their religiously sanctioned immoralities, rather than to the house of Judah which had dispossessed them. Cf. St. Paul's argument, Rom. iv. 12, 16. The LXX. gives the verse thus: "Why was thy strain (lit., seed; the vital principle in thee: 1 John iii. 9) perverted (διεστραμμένον, Deut. xxxii. 5; Matt. xvii. 17) like that of Sidon (Gen. x. 15; Matt. xi. 21), and not like that of Judah? (Ezek. xvi. 3). Beauty deceived thee, paltry desire" (ἡ μικρὰ ἐπιθυμία. Perhaps, "transient, shortlived lust").

beauty hath deceived thee.] Cf. Judith ix. 10; xiii. 16; xvi. 8.

57. Thus have ye dealt.] Lit., "So used ye to do to the daughters of Israel, and they, for fear, would company with you (be your daughters of Israel, and they for fear companied with you: but the daughter of Juda would not abide your wickedness.

Digitized by Microsoft®

58 Now therefore tell me, Under what tree didst thou take them companying together? Who answered, Under an ‖holm tree.

‖Or, kind of oak.

59 Then said Daniel unto him, Well; thou hast also lied against thine own head: for the angel of God waiteth with the sword to cut thee in two, that he may destroy you.

60 With that all the assembly cried out with a loud voice, and praised God, who saveth them that trust in him.

61 And they arose against the two elders, for Daniel had convicted them of false witness by their own mouth:

62 And according to the law of Moses [c]they did unto them in such sort as they maliciously intended to do to their neighbour: and they put them to death. Thus the innocent blood was saved the same day.

[c] Deut. 19. 19. Prov. 19. 5.

63 Therefore Chelcias and his wife praised God for their daughter Suparamours)." The former Elder was charged by the young prophet with corrupting justice; this one is upbraided with habitual corruption of his countrywomen—a reminiscence, probably, of 1 Sam. ii. 22, where the two sons of Eli are represented as guilty of such debauchery. The contrast of the noble firmness of "a daughter of Juda" (Susanna) with the weak submission of "the daughters of Israel" (the women of the Northern kingdom, or the Ten Tribes) is curious. Cf. Hos. iv. 15.

58. Under an holm tree.] The Gk. term πρῖνος denotes the "ilex" or "evergreen oak:" see Theophr. 'Hist. Plant.' iii. 16; Dioscor. iv. 48. According to Liddell and Scott, πρῖνος is also the name of a small species, with prickly leaves, bearing berries; from the kermes of which a scarlet dye was made, i.e. Quercus coccifera (Theophr. 'Hist. Plant.' iii. 7. 3), which is still called πρινάρι in Greece. The Vulg. and Syr. H. keep the Greek word; Old Lat. has ilex (so Syr. W_1. and Arab.); but Syr. W_2. and L_2. "pomegranate."

59. Well; thou hast also lied.] Rather, "Well hast thou also lied." See v. 55 supra.

the angel of God waiteth.] Or, "the angel of God is waiting, sword in hand, to saw thee asunder, that he may utterly destroy you (both)." Cf. Num. xxii. 31; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16; 1 Chron. xxi. 16. 27. LXX.: "And Daniel said, Thou sinner, now the angel of the Lord standeth with the sword—until the people shall destroy you—that he may saw thee up" (ἵνα καταπρίσῃ σε). "And all the synagogue cried out over the youth (ἐπὶ τῷ νεωτέρῳ), that out of their own mouth he had brought them both to confessing their false witness" (ὁμολόγους αὐτοὺς κατέστησεν ἀμφοτέρους ψευδομάρτυρας: cf. Eurip. 'Androm.' 635). "And as the law orders (διαγορεύει), they did unto them, according as they had maliciously intended against their sister" (so Syr. H.).

62. maliciously intended.] See v. 43 supra. As to the law referred to, see Deut. xix. 16–21. Death by stoning was the penalty for adulterers: see Deut. xxii. 24 sq. Cod. 34 expressly notes that the two Elders were stoned, both here and at v. 45 supra.

Thus the innocent blood.] "And innocent blood was saved on that day." See Deut. xix. 10; xxi. 8, 9. This phrase and the two following verses are not read in the LXX., which concludes the piece thus: "And they gagged them (ἐφίμωσαν, Mark i. 25; Matt. xxii. 34), and having led them forth threw them into a ravine. Then the angel of the Lord threw fire between (διὰ μέσου) them, and innocent blood was saved on that day. Therefore the young men of Jacob are beloved in their simplicity (ἁπλότητι), and, for ourselves, let us guard as sons virtuous young men (so Fritzsche). For young men are pious, and there will be in them a spirit of knowledge and understanding for ever and ever." But 2 Sam. ii. 7, υἱοὺς δυνατοὺς = בני חיל, suggests a doubt of Fritzsche's emendation of the harsh and, as he says, unexampled construction φυλασσώμεθα εἰς υἱοὺς δυνατοὺς νεωτέρους into φυλ. ὡς υἱοὺς κ.τ.λ. The meaning may be: Let us guard youths for (= that they may become) sons of valour (men of valour or worth, virtus). But perhaps we should translate: "Let us watch over (Heb. נישמרה אל, 1 Sam. xxvi. 15) capable sons when young." It is difficult to imagine that Greek was the original language of this closing sentence. As Greek it is intolerable as well as unintelligible; as a bald rendering from a Semitic tongue its peculiarities are intelligible enough.

Digitized by Microsoft®

sanna, with Joacim her husband, and all the kindred, because there was no dishonesty found in her.

64 From that day forth was Daniel had in great reputation in the sight of the people.

63. dishonesty.] Lit., "unseemly act"—ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα. In Gen. xxxiv. 7, "folly" (= unchastity) is rendered ἄσχημον, and in Deut. xxiv. 1 we read ὅτι εὗρεν ἐν αὐτῇ ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα (Heb. ערות דבר = turpe quid), "because he hath found some shameful thing in her."

64. From that day forth, &c.] Lit., "And Daniel became great before the people, from that day and onward" (ἐπέκεινα, ultra). Cf. Luke i. 15, where it is said of St. John Baptist, "He shall be great before the Lord;" and Gen. x. 9. Syr. W_2. prolongs the verse.

Digitized by Microsoft®

ADDITIONS TO DANIEL.

III. BEL AND THE DRAGON.

כל ליצנותא אסירא חוץ מליצנותא דעכו"ם דשריא דכתיב כרע בל קרס נבו

"All mockery is bound (forbidden) save mockery of idolaters, which is loose (allowed), as it is written, Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth."—Sanhedr. 63 B, l. 30.

THE Midrashic literature supplies evidence that the stories of Bel and the Dragon existed in Aramaic, and probably in Hebrew, at a very early date. Thus Raymund Martini (A.D. 1250) cites vv. 28–42 from a Midrash Bereshith Rabba. He introduces the passage thus: "Habacuc vero prophetam fuisse contemporaneum Danieli inde colligitur ubi in Bereschit Rabba hoc modo scribitur de Joseph." Then follows the extract from the Midrash, written in what may perhaps be called Syro-Chaldee, in default of a better description: "'And they cast him into the pit' [Gen. xxxvii. 24]. This is as it is written in Daniel: 'And the Babylonians gathered themselves together against the king, and turned against him, and were saying one to another, The king has become a Jew; Bel he has broken in pieces, and the dragon he has killed, and the priests he has killed,'" &c. &c. to the end of the story, where Martini adds: "Hucusque Traditio." Vid. his 'Pugio Fidei,' fol. 742 (ed. of Voisin, Paris, 1651, p. 742; ed. of J. B. Carpzov, Lipsiae, 1687, p. 956). The extract agrees generally, though not verbatim, with the corresponding portion of the Syriac text in Hebrew characters, published by Dr. Neubauer in the Appendix to his 'Book of Tobit' (Oxford, 1878), as part of an extract from the Midrash Rabbah de Rabbah, which he identifies with Martini's Bereshith Rabba. The whole section, as given by Dr. Neubauer, may be thus translated:—

"Midrash Rabbāh dĕ Rabbāh, Parashah 'And Jacob dwelt' [Gen. xxxvii. 1], at the verse 'And they cast him into the pit' [Gen. xxxvii. 24]. 'I called upon thy name, O Lord, out of the lowest pit' [Lam. iii. 55]. This is Daniel, who prayed before the Holy One (blessed be He!) out of the pit, and the Holy One (blessed be He!) heard the voice of his prayer, and delivered him from the lions. This is what is written: 'Thou hast heard my voice,' &c. 'Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee,' &c. [Lam. iii. 56, 57]. And so he saith: 'My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me; forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me' [Dan. vi. 23]. And it sufficed not that he delivered him, but he avenged him of his enemies. This is what is written: 'O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul, thou hast redeemed my life' [Lam. iii. 58]. And so he saith: 'And the king commanded, and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den (pit) of lions; them, their children, and their wives: and the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces, or ever they came at the bottom of the den' [Dan. vi. 25]. Behold, we find that Daniel was delivered out of the pit, from the Scripture (המקרא), and our Rabbis have said, 'A tradition (מסורת) is in our hands that another time Daniel was delivered out of the pit of lions, in the days of Cyrus the Persian, because he had denied the idol (ע"ז, lit. strange worship) and destroyed it. They have said: 'The king Astîgôs (marginal gloss: He is Darius the Mede) was gathered unto his fathers, and Cyrus the Persian received his kingdom,' &c." The Midrash here introduces the stories of Bel and the Dragon from the Syriac version, but in Hebrew characters. The text coincides, save in a few minor variations, with the Syriac of Walton's Polyglot. After v. 22 follows the subscription in Hebrew: "Ended is the story of Bel, the image of the Chaldeans." The story of the Dragon is introduced by this superscription: "The matter of the destruction of the Dragon (תנינא), which is called The Burden (or Story) of the Dragon (משא התנין)." After the telling of it in Syriac, the Midrash resumes, of course in Hebrew: "Therefore it is said, 'They have cut off my life in the pit, and cast a stone upon me. Waters flowed over mine head; then I said, I am cut off. I called upon thy name, O Lord, out of the lowest pit' [Lam. iii. 53–55]. It is found that Daniel was twice cast into the pit: once, in the days of Darius the Mede, and another time in the days of Cyrus the Persian his son-in-law (חתנו). And on the former occasion he remained not therein but one night, and was delivered; and on the second, he remained therein seven days, and was delivered. And this, the second history, is not written in the Holy Books (בספרי הקדש). It was perceived that, as the Righteous Man (i.e. Daniel) was accustomed to this miracle, it sufficed to mention it once."

Digitized by Microsoft®

The transcriber of the MS. added the following note:—"These two histories—to wit, the History of Bel, the Image of the Chaldeans, and the Burden of the Dragon—the Nazarenes [i.e. Christians] comprise them in the Canon of the Twenty-four Books of the Prophets, along with three other books. And the translator of them saith that he found them not in the Sacred Tongue [i.e. in Hebrew]."

The stratagem by which Daniel successfully exposed the trickery of the priests has its duplicate in a passage of the Babylonian Talmud (Bechoroth, 8 b).

The Midrash Bĕrêshîth Rabbāh, § 68, contains the following reference to the story of the Dragon. "Another word. 'And behold the Lord stood above it.' 'And behold the angels of God'—this is Daniel—'ascending and descending on it' [see Gen. xxviii. 12, 13], who ascended and brought forth that which it had swallowed out of the midst of its mouth. This is what is written: 'And I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up' [Jer. li. 44]. For Nebuchadnezzar had a dragon (תנין), which would swallow up whatever they cast before it. Quoth Daniel to him, 'Give me leave; and I extirpate him' (אני מתישו). He gave him leave. What did he do? He took straw, and hid nails in the midst thereof. He cast it before it, and the nails pierced its bowels. This is what is written: 'I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up.'"

In the great prophecy against Babylon (Jer. li.) the following words are put into the mouth of the subverted Jewish people: "Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon hath devoured me, he hath crushed me, he hath made me an empty vessel, he hath swallowed me up like a dragon, he hath filled his belly; from my delights he hath pushed me away" (v. 34); and these into the mouth of God, "I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up; and the nations shall not flow together any more unto him: yea, the wall of Babylon is fallen" (v. 44). In the former part of the prophecy the omnipotence of the Creator is finely contrasted with the powerlessness of dead idols: "The Lord of hosts hath sworn by himself . . . He hath made the earth by his power, he hath established the world by his wisdom, and hath stretched out the heaven by his understanding. When he uttereth a voice (i.e. thundereth), there is a tumult of waters in the heavens; and he causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth: lightnings for the rain he maketh, and bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures. Every man is become brutish, without knowledge: every founder is ashamed of the image: for his molten image is a lie, and there is no breath in them. They are vanity, a butt for mockeries; in the time of their punishment they shall perish. The portion of Jacob [i.e. Jehovah] is not like them; for he is the fashioner of all things . . . Jehovah Sabaoth is his Name." Here, then, we have the original germs of the two strange narratives before us. Just as the nucleus of the Story of Susanna is found in a passage of the great prophet of Judah's decline and fall, so the legends of Bel and the Dragon find their ultimate source in another oracle of the same prophet. Jeremiah furnishes the motive, which the Haggada has developed in its own fashion, turning the prophet's poetic imagery and metaphor into coarsely concrete matter of fact; but at the same time illustrating in a highly effective manner the prophet's own moral of the utter futility of idols, and the sole sovereignty of the God of Israel.

Digitized by Microsoft®

It is natural to ask whether the cuneiform inscriptions contribute anything to the elucidation of these curious narratives: for although, as we have seen, the Haggadic exposition or expansion of Jer. li. 34, 44 is sufficient to account for the growth of the two fables, it is still possible that the phraseology of the prophet himself is coloured by mythical conceptions of Babylonian origin. Dr. Bissell refers to 'Records of the Past,' ix. 137, for the story of "a contest between Bel and the Dragon." That legend, however, like the others of the same series, is exceedingly difficult to understand, and the translation referred to is now quite antiquated. I give portions of the text, transliterated into Roman characters, with a version which is the result of a careful comparison of my own translation with another generously communicated by Professor Sayce. The passages illustrating our Apocryphon are tolerably clear.

TABLET K 3437, BRIT. MUS. ASSYRIAN DOCUMENTS.

Obverse.

. . . baṭ-ṭa imnasu usaḫiz
. u ispatᵘ idussu ilul
. . . . (is)cun birka ina panisu
. . . . mustaḫmeṭu zumursu umtalli
(e)busma śapara sulmū pispis Ti'āmat (ir)bitti sāri ustiçbita ana la açē mimmisa sâru iltanu sâru sutu sâru sadu sâru aḫarru idus śapara ustakriba cisti ADSU DINGIR Anim ibni imḫulla sâru limna meḫā asamsutum sâri arba sâri vii sâru GUGU sâru NU-DI-A useçamma sâri sa ibnū śibittisun pispis Ti'āmat sutluḫu tibū arcisu issima belum abuba IZCU-su GAL.a narcabta si culla maḫri galitta ircal› içbatsimma irbit naçmadi idus sa ilul
* * * * *
* * * * *

Reverse.

. ana ADAD-e'a limuttaci tuctinni
. . . dat ummatci luritcuśu sunu IZCUMES-ci endimma anacu u cāsī nibus sasma Ti'āmat annita ina semisa maḫḫur itemi usanni ṭensa iśśima Ti'āmat sitmuris elita sursis malmalis idrura isdā . . . imanni sipta ittanamdi tā(sa) u ilāni sa taḫazi usahilu sunu IZCUMES su(nu) innin̆duma Ti'āmat NUN ME DINGIR MES DINGIR AMAR UT sasmis idlubu kitrubu taḫazis usparirma belᵘ śaparasu usalmisi imḫulla çabit arcati panussu umtassar iptema pīsa Ti'āmat ana lahātisu (or sa) imḫulla usteriba ana la catam saptisa izzuti sāri carsasa izanuma innikud libbasa ma pāsa uspalci iśśuk mulmulla iḫtepi carassa kirbisa ubattika usalliṭ libba

Digitized by Microsoft®

icmisi ma napsatas uballi salamsa iddā elisa izaza (or iziza) ultu Ti'āmat alic pani inaru ciçrisa uptarrira buḫarsa issapḫa u DINGIR MES riçūsa alicu idisa ittarru iplaḫu usaḫḫiru* arcatsun useçuma napsatus ediru ittalamū naparsudis la lihē
. . . bu sunuti ma IZCUMES sunu usabbir

TRANSLATION.

Obverse.

(a weapon) his right hand he made grasp;
. . . . and the quiver at his side he slung (from his shoulder: cf. 'Il,' i. 45).
He shot lightning with his countenance.
With whirling (wrath?) his body he filled.
He made also a net,* to throw round* the monster Tiamat.
The four winds he seized, that nothing* of her might go forth:
The north wind, the south wind, the east wind, the west wind.
By his side he placed the net, the gift of his father Anu.
He created a stormwind, a baleful wind, a hurricane, a whirlwind, Four winds, seven winds, a destroying wind, a wind not to be stilled.
He sent forth also the winds which he had made, the seven of them.
The monster Tiamat coileth herself, cometh after him.
The Lord also raised the Flood, his mighty weapon;
That chariot which levelleth all enemies, he rode.

.

Reverse.

". . . . against my fathers thine enmity thou didst harden.
Let thy people , let them marshal thine arms!
Stand, I and thou will do battle."
Tiamat, on hearing this,
Encounter ordered she, she repeated her command.

* * * * * * *
* * * * * * *

She rehearsed a spell, she poured forth her charm;
And the gods of battle called for their arms.
Then Tiamat assailed the prince of the gods Merodach;
In battle she came on, she closed in conflict.
The Lord also spread his net, he threw it around her;
A stormwind, taking the rear, before him he let loose.
Tiamat opened her mouth to draw it in:
The stormwind she received within her, so that she could not close her lips.
With violence the winds filled her belly, and She was pierced through her heart, and her mouth she opened wide.
She bit the shaft; her belly was stricken through.
Her inside he thrust through, he mastered the heart;
He bound her, and her life he swallowed up.
Her carcase* he cast down, upon her he stood.
When Tiamat the leader he had vanquished,
Her might he broke, her army was routed;
And the gods her helpers, marching beside her,
Wheeled round, were terrified, turned* their back.

* * * * * * *

They clung together in flight, powerless.
. . . . them, and their weapons he brake in pieces.

The above rendering is far from being equally certain throughout. In many places the writer has greatly doubted whether it would not be the more prudent course not to attempt the interpretation of these enigmas of speech. Nothing indeed could more forcibly bring home to the mind the great uncer-

* The terms marked with an asterisk were suggested by Mr. T. G. Pinches, of the Oriental Department of the British Museum, who kindly read through this portion of the sheet with me.

Digitized by Microsoft®

tainty which still clogs the progress of students of Assyrian, than the attempt to wrest an intelligible meaning out of the mythological tablets.

The reader will notice the curious coincidence between the mode in which the Dragon is slain by Daniel, and Tiamat by Merodach. This can hardly be accidental. The legends which form the basis of our Apocryphon must have originated among the Jews of Babylon, who, as the Talmud shews, were more or less acquainted with Babylonian myths about dragons and sea-monsters. It is not of course necessary to suppose that the Jewish authors of these stories were versed in cuneiform writing, or even that they had any accurate knowledge of the mythus of The Combat of Marduḳ and Tiamat. They could hardly, however, have been wholly ignorant of the popular legends; and the common representations on seals, of which so many examples are preserved in the Museums of Europe, would afford the inexact sort of knowledge which finds its expression in the Haggada. Dragons and serpents of huge size are often referred to in the Babylonian Talmud. Thus in the Mishna (Abōdāh Zārāh, 42 B) we read: "Whoso findeth vessels whereon is the form of the sun, the form of the moon, the form of a dragon (צירת דרקון), let him throw them into the Sea of Salt. Rabbi Simeon ben Gamaliel saith, Those which are upon valuable vessels are forbidden; those which are upon common vessels are allowed." In the Gemara (ib., 43 A, line 15) R. Joshua ben Levi is related to have said: "I was once walking after R. Eliezer haQafar Beribbi in the way, and he found there a seal-ring, whereon was an image of a dragon. And he met a young pagan, and spake not to him at all. He met an adult pagan, and said to him, Desecrate it; but he would not. He beat him, and (then) he desecrated it" (by breaking off a bit of the image). The Jews in Babylonia must have often found such objects graven with the images of Bel-Merodach and Tiamat, and other mythological subjects, and doubtless their fanaticism destroyed many. The idol Bel-Merodach, the tutelar deity of Babylon, had a famous temple there, which is mentioned thus in Abōdāh Zārāh, 11 B, med.: "R. Hanan son of R. Hisda says that Rab said—or, according to others, R. Hanan son of Rabba says that Rab said—Five houses of idols are pre-eminent (קבועין). These are the house of Bel at Babel, the house of Nebo at Cursi, Tra^{sh}ta which is at Mepheg [Ashtoreth-Derceto at Hierapolis-Mabûg], Çaripha which is at Ascalon [Hdt. i. 105, Aphrodite], Nashra which is in Arabia [i.e. the Eagle, which in Arabic as in Assyro-Babylonian is the name of a star or star-group]. When R. Dimi came (from Palestine to Babylon), they added to them Jarid [Jārūd, serpent] which is at Ain Beci, Nidbaca which is at Accho—there are some who say, Nithbara which is at Accho. R. Dimi of Nehardea hands down the converse, viz. Nidbaca in Ain Beci and Jarid in Accho." It is noteworthy that serpent-worship is here recorded of a Palestinian town.

But although this long tractate has strange worship, i.e. idolatry, for its topic, it does not again mention Bel; and it is curious how little of correct reminiscence of this kind is to be found in Jewish literature. Bel-Merodach is one of the numerous solar figures of Oriental mythology, and his adversary Tiamat is the primeval chaos or darkness, out of which all things emerged. She had her dwelling in the sea, and is represented on the seals and cylinders as a winged monster with horns, hooves, sharp talons, and a scaly tail. She and her demon troops waged unceasing war against the god of light. The student of universal mythology will be familiar with such conceptions. Night, the clouds, the sea, are in turn described as monstrous serpents or dragons, now vanquishing and now vanquished by the god of day. The resolution of almost all genuine products of the mythopoeic faculty into variations of this one theme will surprise nobody who recollects that the mental infancy of man is characterised, not by exuberant fertility, but by a uniform barrenness of imagination. Tiamat may be compared with Apepi, the great dragon of the Egyptian mythus, who is called Hemhemti, "the Roarer" (i.e. the thunder-cloud), before whom Ra is "in a flutter"; "Seb standeth still in terror, and the company of the mighty gods is in a quake." Apepi is at last "overcome by the fire and flinty sword of the Sun-god, and is forced back into his cavern, and over him is placed a stone of forty cubits, while the devouring flame preys upon his bones" (Renouf). A trace of the like symbolism may perhaps be seen in Job xi. 13.

Digitized by Microsoft®

It is evident from Gen. i. 21, Ps. lxxiii. 13, that תנין (dragon) usually meant any kind of aquatic monster (κῆτος). In Isa. li. 9, Ezek. xxxii. 2, it is "the crocodile," as an emblem of Egypt. In Exod. vii. 9, 10, 12, it denotes "serpent," the etymological import of the term being apparently "that which is much extended." For Talmudic stories about huge serpents, see Baba Bathra, 73 B, et seq.; Chullin, 127 A; Sanhedr. 59 B. Compare also the legends about the Leviathan, which in Scripture means the crocodile (Isa. xxvii. 1; Ps. lxxiv. 14, civ. 26; Job xl. 21), but in the Talmud a mysterious monster, created male and female on the fifth day (Bab. Bathra, 74 B). Fearing that if they multiplied they would ravage the earth, God emasculated the male and killed the female, and preserved her flesh for the great banquet of the righteous in the world to come. A similar tale is added about the Behemoth (hippopotamus). Cf. also Abōd. Zārāh, 3 A. The following extracts from Abōdāh Zārāh (Mishn. 7, Per. 4) are good instances of the mingled shrewdness and sarcasm with which the old Rabbis could argue against idolatry. "They asked the Elders in Rome, If his (God's) good pleasure be not in idol-worship, why does he not put an end to it? They answered, If they (i.e. the heathen) worshipped a thing that was not necessary to the world, he would put an end to it. As it is, they worship the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, and the Zodiacal Signs; must he destroy his world for the sake of the fools? They answered, If so, let him destroy anything (any object of idolatry) that is not necessary to the world, and let him leave anything that is necessary. They (the Jews) answered, Then we should be strengthening the hands of the worshippers of these things, who would say, Ye see that they are gods, for they are not put an end to." The Gemara has the following wise remarks:—"Lo, he that stealeth a seah of wheat, and soweth it in a field—it were right that it should not come up (being stolen goods). But the world goes on in its wonted course; notwithstanding, the fools who deal corruptly will have to pay the penalty. If a man go in unto his neighbour's wife, she ought not to conceive. But the world goes on in its wonted course, and fools who deal corruptly will have to pay the penalty. A philosopher asked R. Gamaliel, It is written in your law, The Lord thy God is a consuming fire, he is a jealous God (Deut. iv. 24): why is your God jealous at the worshippers and not at (the idol) itself? He said unto him, I will tell thee a parable wherefore it is so. The matter is like the king who had a son, who reared a dog, and named it after his father's name, and whenever he swore would say, By the life of the dog Abba. When the king heard thereof, with whom would he be angry, with the son or with the dog? He said, With the son. He said (also) unto him, Thou art calling it (the idol) a dog; and is there no reality (מַמָּשׁ) in it? He (R. Gamaliel) saith, And what hast thou seen? He saith unto him, Once a fire broke out in our city, and the whole city was burnt, but the idol-house was not burnt. He saith unto him, I will tell thee why, by a parable. The matter is like the king against whom a province had rebelled. When he made war, did he make it with the living or with the dead? He saith unto him, Dog thou callest it, dead thou callest it. If it be so, let him destroy them (the idols) out of the world. He saith unto him, If the heathen served only a thing that the world had no need of, he would abolish it. As it is, they serve the Sun, the Moon, the Stars, the Zodiacal Signs, the Rivers, and the Valleys: must God destroy his world for the sake of fools?"

After what has been said, it is hardly worth while to notice the objections raised by matter-of-fact critics against the two closely-connected stories of our Apocryphon. "Anachronisms," "literary extravagances," "a legendary character," are obvious on the face of the narratives; but such faults as these, though valid against any pretensions to the rank of authentic history, do not render the stories less effective as pieces of Haggadic satire, or less interesting as preserving vestiges of a cycle of popular legends relating to Daniel. In the LXX. the piece bears the curious title ἐκ προφητείας Ἀμβακοὺμ υἱοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐκ τῆς φυλῆς Λευί: "From the prophecy of Habakkuk son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi." (So also the Syro-Hexaplar.) Bertholdt supposed that this Habakkuk was an Egyptian Jew, who worked up a Volkssage about Daniel into the present narrative. It is more likely that the prophet Habakkuk, who probably flourished in the last decade of the 7th cent. B.C., and may well have been a Levite (see the subscription to chap. iii. 19), is the author intended (so S. Jerome);[1] in which case, as Fritzsche observes, the piece may be an extract from a pseudepigraphic writing attributed to that prophet. This partly explains the language of S. Athanasius ('Synops. Script. Sacr.;' in Migne, 'Series Græc.' tom. xxviii. 432): Βαροὺχ Ἀμβακοὺμ Ἐζεχιὴλ καὶ Δανιὴλ ψευδεπίγραφα. The fact that in the LXX. Daniel is introduced as a priest, and as a person otherwise unknown, points in the same direction.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[1] Eusebius supposed another Habakkuk and another Daniel.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE HISTORY OF THE DESTRUCTION

OF

‖ BEL AND THE DRAGON,

‖ Gr. Bel's dragon.

Cut off from the end of DANIEL.

19 The fraud of Bel's priests is discovered by Daniel, 27 and the dragon slain, which was worshipped. 33 Daniel is preserved in the lions' den. 42 The king doth acknowledge the God of Daniel, and casteth his enemies into the same den.

AND king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus of Persia received his kingdom.

2 And Daniel ‖conversed with the king, and was honoured above all his friends. ‖ Or, lived with the king.

3 Now the Babylonians had an idol, called Bel, and there were spent upon him every day twelve great measures of fine flour, and forty sheep, and six vessels of wine.

1. king Astyages.] See Hdt. i. 107, according to which passage Cyrus was son of Mandane, daughter of Astyages the Mede, and Cambyses the Persian. Hdt. i. 130 relates that Cyrus deprived Astyages of his kingdom, and kept him at his court until the old king died. Our text appears to assert that Cyrus only assumed the sovereignty on the death of his grandfather. Ancient authorities are not agreed as to whether Cyrus was the immediate successor of Astyages (Diod., Justin, Strabo, Canon of Ptolemy), or not (Xen. 'Cyrop.' i. 19, Cyaxares; Joseph. 'Ant.' x. 11. 4, Darius); nor as to the manner in which the Persian sovereign got possession of the Median realm. The recently discovered cuneiform records of Nabonidus and Cyrus himself have thrown unexpected light upon difficulties which were the despair of bygone generations of scholars. Cyrus relates that Astyages "assembled (his forces), and against Kurash king of Anshan (Cyrus king of Persia) to take him he marched . . . Ishtuvēgū (Astyages), his forces rebelled against him, and with hands seized (took him prisoner), to Kurash they ga(ve him up). (Marched) Kurash to the land of Agamtanu, the royal city; silver, gold . . . of the land of Agamtanu he carried off, and to the land of Anshan he took the plunder." This generally confirms the statements of Herodotus on the matter. (See 'Trans. Soc. Bibl. Arch.' vii. 155.) Nabonidus (Nabû-náhid) states that his god Merodach "Kuras king of Anzan, his young servant, with his clansmen caused to march; the far-reaching people of Manda (the Medes) he defeated; Ishtuvêgû king of the people of Manda he captured, and his hoards to his own land he took." ('Cylinder of Nabonidus,' lines 27–29.) In the Vulgate, this is the concluding verse of Susanna.

2. And Daniel conversed with the king.] Lit., "and Daniel was a companion of the king." Συμβιωτής, conviva, is a term so used in Polyb. viii. 12. 3; and Cic. 'Fam.,' ix. 10. Plutarch has the word of the confidants of the Emperors ('Jul. Caes.' 21). Συμβίωσις occurs in Wisd. viii. 3, 9, 16. Syr. W. prefixes the statement: "And Daniel —his glory was equal with that of the king."

was honoured above all his friends.] Comp. the favour which Daniel is said to have enjoyed with Darius the Mede (Dan. vi. 3). In ch. i. 21 we read that Daniel "continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus," i.e. remained in Babylon until the year when permission was given for the Jewish exiles to return. Ch. x. purports to relate a vision seen by Daniel "in the third year of Cyrus king of Persia."

The LXX. and Syr. H. begin the narrative thus: "A man there was, a priest, whose name was Daniel son of Abal, a companion of the king of Babylon." Thus the particular king is left undetermined. See Ezra viii. 2, Neh. x. 7, for a priest named Daniel, contemporary with Ezra. According to Dan. i. 3, 6, the prophet of this name was hardly a priest. The name Ἀβαλ is probably corrupted from some word like Ἀβιήλ or Ἀβιχαίλ (Num. iii. 35). This seems better than to regard it as a variant of Ἄβελ, הבל, Abel, Gen. iv. 2. Epiphanius ('Advers. Haeret.' lv. 3) speaks of Σαβαὰν (? שבעון = שמעון, Simeon) as the father of the prophet Daniel.

3. Bel.] Βήλ, in Herod. Ζεὺς Βῆλος, the Assyro-Babylonian Bêlu, Bêl; that is, Bel-

4 And the king worshipped it, and went daily to adore it: but Daniel worshipped his own God. And the king said unto him, Why dost not thou worship Bel?

5 Who answered and said, Because I may not worship idols made with hands, but the living God, who hath created the heaven and the earth, and hath sovereignty over all flesh.

Merodach, the tutelar god of Babylon. Cf. Isa. xlvi. 1, בֵּל, which reproduces this foreign name accurately. It answers to the Heb. בַּעַל, Aram. בַּעַל, Baal. This Bel, who is identified with Merodach, the god of the planet Jupiter, is distinct from the old Bel of the first triad of gods, who is called the "father of the gods," and whose consort is Bêlit (Beltis), "the mother of the gods." Bel-Merodach is, in fact, styled "Bêlu the son of Bêlu." His consort is Zarpanitum or Zirbâniti, called "mistress (bêlit) of the countries" and "mistress of the gods," and "firstborn of Anum." She is the planet Venus (Dilbad). See also Hdt. i. 131; Μύλιττα = Bêlit.

there were spent upon him every day.] It appears from Herodotus that the god was honoured in this fashion with what the Romans called lectisternia: Hdt. i. 183. Cf. also Diod. Sic. ii. 9. The Phillipps' Cylinder gives us Nebuchadnezzar's testimony to the same fact:

"When Merodach, mighty lord, to the lordship of the land Raised me, and Widespread peoples for shepherding gave me;
To Merodach, the god my maker, I was reverently obedient,
To follow his laws I bowed the neck.
His rich oblations,
His splendid freewill offerings,
Above the former amount I increased.
For one day an ox, fine (?), fat, ...
Fish, fowl, spices (?)
Honey, curd, milk, the best of oil,
Sweet wine (?), mead (?), strong drink, . . .
Costly wine, wine of Izallam,
Of Tu'immu, of Çimmini, of Helbon,
Of Aranabanum, of Suham,
Of Bit-kubatim and Bitatim,
Like the waters of a river, numberless,
In the chalices of Merodach and Zarpanitu,
My lords, I made to abound."
(1 R. 65, col. 1, 8 sqq.)

great measures of fine flour, . . . vessels of wine.] Σεμιδάλεως ἀρτάβαι . . . οἴνου μετρηταί. The first word, which means "the finest wheaten flour" (Lat. simila, similago), represents Heb. מִנְחָה, "meat-offering," A.V.: see Lev. ii. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7; Isa. i. 13. Cf. also Gen. xviii. 6. Ἀρτάβη occurs Isa. v. 10, for Heb. חֹמֶר, "homer," A.V. The Artaba was a Persian measure, containing 1 medimnus 3 choenices, according to Hdt. i. 192; or 1 medimnus, according to Suidas and Hesychius. The former assignment is probably the more exact. The μετρητὴς was the common Athenian liquid measure (= ἀμφορεύς), holding about 9 gallons. The Vulg. gives amphorae; but the Roman amphora = $\frac{2}{3}$ Attic metretes. In 2 Chron. iv. 5 the term renders Heb. בַּת, "bath;" in 1 Kings xviii. 32 סְאָה, "seah." σατόν. It is the "firkin" of John ii. 6. For another account of Bel's daily allowance, see Josippon ben Gorion, apud Selden, Syntag. 2, 'de Belo et Dracone.'

Instead of "40 sheep," LXX. and Syr. H. have the disproportionate 4; and "oil" instead of "wine." See vv. 10, 14, 21 (LXX.). Syr. W.: "40 rams."

4. the king worshipped.] The verb is ἐσέβετο, venerabatur (Josh. iv. 24) = יָרֵא, timuit (Jon. i. 9; Job i. 9). Cyrus, perhaps, was not a monotheist; if he was, he displayed a politic toleration of the religions of his foreign subjects, not unlike that which afterwards distinguished the Roman empire. In the annals of Nabû-nâhid, he represents himself as enjoying the special favour of Merodach, who foretells his march upon Babylon, and accompanies him thither. Cyrus even asserts that he has made daily prayers to Bel and Nebo that they might intercede with Merodach on his behalf. The legend before us, therefore, in its representation here, happens to coincide in part with the facts of history.

Daniel worshipped.] προσεκύνει, "used to fall down before," often in LXX. as = הִשְׁתַּחֲוָה, se procubuit, an act of homage to God or man (1 Chron. xxix. 20; Gen. xviii. 2, xxiv. 26). In Daniel = Chaldee סְגִד (ii. 46; iii. 5, 6, 7, &c.). (The same verb as "to adore" ante.)

LXX., Syr. H.: Δανιὴλ δὲ προσηύχετο πρὸς κύριον, "but Daniel used to pray unto Jehovah." A similar contrast is presented in Dan. iii.; cf. also Dan. vi. 11. So Syr. W.: "God," absolutely. At the end it adds rightly, "my god."

5. Who answered and said, &c.] Lit., "But he said, Because I worship (σέβομαι) not idols," &c. (Isa. ii. 8, xxxi. 7; Deut. iv. 28; 2 Kings xix. 18; Ps. cxv. 4).

who hath created the heaven.] τὸν κτίσαντα τὸν οὐρανὸν κ.τ.λ. So the LXX. Gen. xiv. 19, 22, for Heb. "possessor of heaven and earth." The word here may have been בּוֹרֵא, creans (Isa. xlv. 7, 8; Amos iv. 13).

Digitized by Microsoft®

6 Then said the king unto him, Thinkest thou not that Bel is a living God? seest thou not how much he eateth and drinketh every day?

7 Then Daniel smiled, and said, O king, be not deceived: for this is but clay within, and brass without, and did never [a]eat or drink any thing.

[a] Ecclus. 20. 19.

8 So the king was wroth, and called for his priests, and said unto them, If ye tell me not who this is that devoureth these expences, ye shall die.

9 But if ye can certify me that Bel devoureth them, then Daniel shall die: for he hath spoken blasphemy against Bel. And Daniel said unto the king, Let it be according to thy word.

10 Now the priests of Bel were hath sovereignty over all flesh.] ἔχοντα πάσης σαρκὸς κυρείαν. The uncommon term κυρεία, imperium, = Chaldee יְשְׁלְטָנָא, Dan. iv. 19, vi. 27; and in Dan. xi. 3, 4, 5 = Heb. מֶמְשָׁל and מִמְשָׁל.

The LXX. has: "And Daniel said unto the king, None worship I save Jehovah (κύριον anarthrous), the God who created the heaven," &c. Theod. is more antithetical. He contrasts idols which are manufactured, and therefore lifeless objects, with the living God who made all things and is the rightful Lord of all living. Cf. Num. xvi. 22: "El, god of the spirits of all flesh." This is, of course, written from the Jewish standpoint. We may remember that the Bel of the first triad was called the "Creator" (bânû); and Merodach, to whose worship the great Nebuchadnezzar was especially devoted, is styled by him and others "king of heaven and earth," "exalted ruler," "the god my Maker," "the god of gods," &c.

6. Thinkest thou not that Bel.] LXX.: "This one, then, is he not a god? Seest thou not how much is spent upon him (vid. v. 3 supra) every day?" The second question in Theod. is ἢ οὐχ ὁρᾷς κ.τ.λ., "Or (if thou dost not) seest thou not," &c. There is something intensely ironical in the proof alleged for Bel's real existence—no other or higher function of life than "eating and drinking," the almost mechanical process of nutrition (τὸ θρεπτικόν) which man shares with the brute creation. Cf. Ps. l. 7–13. The stress laid on the quantity of food consumed shews that the god is regarded merely as a sort of giant or magnified man. A necessity of eating is a proof not of divinity but of mortality; it is a contradiction of the autarkeia of deity (Arnald).

7. smiled—γελάσας—is added by Theod. For the compound of "clay and brass," cf. Dan. ii. 32, 34.

be not deceived.] μὴ πλανῶ, "do not go on deceiving thyself." Cf. Gen. xxxvii. 14; Wisd. ii. 21. The LXX. is more emphatic: "By no means let any man mislead thee by false argument" (μηδαμῶς μηδείς σε παραλογιζέσθω. Gen. xxix. 25; Josh. ix. 22); "and I swear unto thee by Jehovah the God of gods (Syr. H. obelizes the oath), that this one hath never eaten anything." For the expression "God of gods," see Dan. xi. 36, ii. 47; Deut. x. 17; Ps. cxxxvi. 2; and the note on v. 5 supra.

8. his priests.] I.e. the priests of Bel, as Syr. W. explains. LXX., "the overseers of the temple"—τοὺς προεστηκότας τοῦ ἱεροῦ.

If ye tell me not.] Cf. Dan. ii. 5. LXX. and Syr. H.: "Shew (παραδείξατε, Ezek. xxii. 2; Exod. xxvii. 2) who eateth the things prepared for Bel; otherwise ye shall die—or Daniel, who allegeth that the things (αὐτὰ) are not eaten by him" (i.e. Bel). The king means to say, One or the other must die, and the issue will depend on your answer. The brevity of expression is remarkable. εἰ δὲ μήγε ἀποθανεῖσθε, ἢ Δανιὴλ ὁ φάσκων κ.τ.λ.: "or (if ye do shew it) Daniel (shall die), who pretendeth," &c. The LXX. text continues: "But they said, 'Bel himself is he that devoureth them.' But Daniel said unto the king, 'Let it be thus: If I shew not that it is not Bel that devoureth these things, I will die (= let me be put to death) and all my friends'" (οἱ παρ' ἐμοί. Susann. 33, οἱ παρ' αὐτῆς. This seems to shew that οἱ παρ' ἐμοῦ should be read here. See v. 14 infra, where for "his servants" LXX. has τοὺς παρ' αὐτοῦ).

expences.] δαπάνη. Hesychius explains the word by τροφή, "keep." Cf. Ezra vi. 4, 8; and δαπάνημα, 2 Macc. xi. 31. The Syr. W. and Arabic versions have a term which literally means "outgoing" (cf. "income"). Perhaps the Heb. was the late הוֹצָאָה. See the verb in 2 Kings xii. 13.

10. Now the priests of Bel.] The number assigned looks small beside that of Ahab and Jezebel's Baal-priests (1 Kings xviii. 19, 22). After this statement of the sum of the priests, LXX., Syr. H. proceed as follows: "But they led the king into the idol's chamber (εἰδωλεῖον, 1 Macc. i. 47; 1 Cor. viii. 10), and the meats were set on in the presence of the king and Daniel, and wine mingled was brought threescore and ten, beside their wives and children. And the king went with Daniel into the temple of Bel.

11 So Bel's priests said, Lo, we go out: but thou, O king, set on the meat, and make ready the wine, and shut the door fast, and seal it with thine own signet;

12 And to morrow when thou comest in, if thou findest not that Bel hath eaten up all, we will suffer death: or else Daniel, that speaketh falsely against us.

13 And they little regarded it: for under the table they had made a privy entrance, whereby they entered in and set on for Bel. And Daniel said, Thou thyself seest that these things are here (κεῖται), O king. Thou, then, shalt seal the bolts (τὰς κλεῖδας = κλεῖθρα here) of the temple, when it shall be shut. But the saying pleased the king. But Daniel ordered his people (τοὺς παρ' αὐτοῦ) to put all men out (ἐκβαλόντας, Mark v. 40) of the temple, and sprinkle all the temple with ashes, without the knowledge of any of those who were outside of it. And then having sealed the temple, he bade seal it with the king's seal and with the seals of certain honoured priests. And it was done so." The word "sprinkle"—καταπάσαι—is Fritzsche's emendation of καταστῆσαι (Cod. Chisian.): cf. 2 Macc. x. 25. He also suggests καταστρῶσαι and κατασεῖσαι (see note on v. 14 infra). Syr. H.: "to prepare."

"Temple" is "house," οἶκος, בית (1 Kings vi. 1; 2 Kings xix. 37). The specific Heb. term for "temple" or "palace," hêkāl (היכל), Assyr. Êkallu^{m}, is said to be of pre-Semitic origin, and is referred to the Accadian ê-gal, "great house." At Babylon the chief temple of Bel crowned a pyramid built of brick in eight stages, now represented by the mound called Bâbil.

11. we go out.] Gk. ἀποτρέχομεν ἔξω. See note on Susanna 7.

set on the meat.] παράθες τὰ βρώματα. Παρατίθημι is the usual expression for "setting food before" guests, from the Homeric poems downwards. Cf. Gen. xviii. 8; Luke x. 8; 2 Kings vi. 22.

make ready the wine.] Gk. τὸν οἶνον κεράσας θές, "mingle the wine and set it (on):" cf. John ii. 10, πᾶς ἄνθρωπος πρῶτον τὸν καλὸν οἶνον τίθησι. Fritzsche observes that it was a Greek and Roman, but hardly an Oriental, and least of all an old Jewish custom, to mingle wine with water, as here represented. But such passages as Prov. ix. 2, 5; Isa. i. 22, may be alleged in favour of a contrary opinion; and Gesenius ('Thesaur.,' p. 808, s. v. מסך) declares that the Hebrews and Arabs sometimes followed this practice. Moreover, the red wine of the Passover cups was tempered with water—usually in the proportion of two parts of water to one of wine; whence was derived the custom of the early Church in the matter of mixing the Eucharistic chalice. It appears to have been also an Oriental practice to flavour wines with spices, honey, and other condiments; and some understand the passages Prov. ix. 2, 5 in this sense: cf. Isa. v. 22; Mark xv. 23; and the Talmudic Abôd. Zâr. 58 B; Maaser sheni, 2 A; Pesach. 108 B (where wine is distinguished as חי, vivum, i.e. purum, and מזוג, mixtum. The same root in Arab. means "to mix wine with water," and is used here in the Arab. and Syriac versions). Gesenius explains the word מָזֶג in Cant. vii. 3 thus: "vinum idque poculo infusum ibique aqua temperatum."

In an inscription of Nebuchadnezzar no fewer than eight kinds of "costly" wines—one that of Helbon, so highly prized by the Persian kings afterwards—are mentioned as used in libations. See Schrader, 'Keilinschr.,' p. 426.

shut the door fast.] ἀπόκλεισον. Vid. Susanna 18.

seal it with thine own signet.] According to the LXX. (vid. supr.) the door was sealed also with the signets of some of the principal priests. In like manner the lions' den was sealed with the signet of the king, and with that of his lords (Dan. vi. 17). Seals were of peculiar importance in Babylonian business of all kinds; and great numbers of royal and other seals, made of carnelian, agate, jasper, alabaster, &c., have been found in Assyrian and Babylonian mounds, inscribed with mythological subjects and sometimes inscriptions in cuneiform.

12. that speaketh falsely against us.] ὁ ψευδόμενος καθ' ἡμῶν: cf. James iii. 14. The sense involves "shall die," which Syr. W. adds.

13. they little regarded it.] That is, the danger. So De Wette: "they were careless." The Gk. is αὐτοὶ δὲ κατεφρόνουν, "but they, on their part, were disdainful," or "behaved scornfully." Vulg.: contemnabant autem. The verb is used absolutely, as in Thucyd. ii. 11. It hardly means "reflecting," either here or in Hdt. viii. 10, as Fritzsche suggests: vid. also Dan. iii. 12, xi. 37. "Continually" is διόλου; vid. Ezek. xxxviii. 8. The verbs are imperf.: "they used to enter and consume" (ἀνήλουν). Syr. W.: "But they, bein continually, and consumed those things.

14 So when they were gone forth, the king set meats before Bel. Now Daniel had commanded his servants to bring ashes, and those they strewed throughout all the temple in the presence of the king alone: then went they out, and shut the door, and sealed it with the king's signet, and so departed.

15 Now in the night came the priests with their wives and children, as they were wont to do, and did eat and drink up all.

16 In the morning betime the king arose, and Daniel with him.

17 And the king said, Daniel, are the seals whole? And he said, Yea, O king, they be whole.

18 And as soon as he had opened the door, the king looked upon the cause they were confident—for there was made for them an entry," &c.; an anacoluthon. Ad fin.: "they would eat everything that was set on for Bel, and carry off anything that was left."

14. So . . . the king set.] Lit., "and it came to pass . . . and the king set"—a common Hebraism: ויהי ויתן. "The meats," i.e. the customary viands, which had been prepared. Syr. W. is again fuller, and looks more original: "When, then, the priests of Bel had gone forth, the king brought meats, and filled the table, and set it before Bel; and he filled the vessels with wine, after their custom, and went forth." What follows is literally: "and Daniel commanded his young men (παιδαρίοις) and they brought ashes (τέφρα, Tobit vi. 17; viii. 2: LXX. has σποδός) and shook down all the temple" (κατέσεισαν ὅλον τὸν ναὸν, a singular and isolated use of κατασείω. Vid. 1 Macc. vi. 38). Syr. W., "and he sifted it in a sieve before the king, in all the house of Bel;" Vulg., cribravit per totum templum. A.V. follows the reading of Codd. 34, 49, al.: κατέστρωσαν. Another reading is κατέπασαν, "besprinkled" (Cod. 148); cf. LXX. καταπάσαι, and Arist., 'Clouds,' 177.

with the king's signet.] Syr. W. adds, "and with the seal of Daniel." Vid. note on v. 12 supra.

16. In the morning betime the king arose.] "And the king arose early in the morning." A common Heb. phrase. Cf. Josh. iii. 1; viii. 10. Syr. W. adds: "and they went thither."

17. whole.] "Intact," "untampered with," integer, incolumis; σῶος = שָׁלֵם.

The narrative in the LXX. is again considerably different: "And it came to pass on the morrow they came unto the place, but the priests of Bel through secret doors (ψευδοθυρίδων, v. 20 τὰ ψευδοθύρια, semel dicta=Theod. ἡ κρυπτὴ θύρα. Cf. ψευδόθυρον; Cic. 'in Verr.' ii. 2, 20) had entered and eaten up all the things which lay before Bel (τὰ παρακείμενα τῷ B. vid. Ecclus. xxxiv. 16; Polyb. iii. 57. 8) and the wine. (Syr. H. gets rid of the zeugma by supplying "drunk" before "the wine.") And Daniel said, Look upon (ἐπεῖδον, Exod. ii. 25; 1 Macc. iii. 59) your seals, whether they remain (unchanged), O ye priests; and thou, O king, consider whether aught hath taken place not according to thy will (σκέψαι μή τί σοι ἀσύμφωνον γεγένηται, Wisd. xviii. 10; Acts xxviii. 25. A covert allusion to what had really happened in the temple). And they found that the seal had lasted" (εὗρον ὡς ἦν [ἡ Fr.] σφραγίς; cf. Dan. i. 21). The words cannot mean: "they found it as it was yesterday," for "yesterday" is not in the Greek. They might be rendered: "They found how the seal (really) was;" or if σφραγὶς be struck out, as Fr. suggests, "they found how it was." But Syr. H. has the word. "And they cast away the seal, and on opening the doors saw all things consumed (v. 3, δεδαπανημένα) that had been set on, and the tables empty; and the king was glad and said to Daniel, Great is Bel, and there is not with him deceit (cf. John i. 48). And Daniel laughed much, and said to the king: Hither! behold the deceit of the priests. And Daniel said, O king, these footsteps—whose are they? And the king said, Of men and women and children. And he came unto the house wherein the priests were abiding (ἦσαν—καταγίνομενοι), and found (Syr. H. "they found") the meats of Bel and the wine; and Daniel shewed the king the secret doors, whereby the priests used to enter and consume (ἐδαπάνων) the things set on for Bel. And the king brought them forth from the Belium (βήλιον, "temple of Bel;" here only. Cf. Πύθιον, Thucyd. ii. 15), and delivered them to Daniel, and that which was expended (τὴν δαπάνην, v. 8) upon him (i.e. upon the god) he gave to Daniel, but Bel he overthrew." With the king's cry of "Great is Bel," cf. Acts xix. 28. In the words "Hither, behold the deceit (δόλος) of the priests," there is an intentional antithesis to the king's exclamation, "Great is Bel, and there is not with him deceit," which Theod. has eliminated (v. 19).

table, and cried with a loud voice, Great art thou, O Bel, and with thee is no deceit at all.

19 Then laughed Daniel, and held the king that he should not go in, and said, Behold now the pavement, and mark well whose footsteps are these.

20 And the king said, I see the footsteps of men, women, and children. And then the king was angry, 21 And took the priests with their wives and children, who shewed him the privy doors, where they came in, and consumed such things as were upon the table.

22 Therefore the king slew them, and delivered Bel into Daniel's power, who destroyed him and his temple.

23 ‖And in that same place there was a great dragon, which they of Babylon worshipped.

‖ Some add this title, Of the dragon.

20. And then the king was angry.] This clause—it is not a sentence in the Greek—belongs to the next verse. "And in a rage (ὀργισθείς) the king then seized (συνέλαβε) the priests and their wives, &c. and they (the priests, in fear of their lives) shewed him the secret doors whereby they used to enter, and consume (ἐδαπάνων, Judith xi. 13; xii. 4) the things upon the table" (τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς τραπέζης. Codd. III., XII., 26. al., τῇ τραπέζῃ. Fritzsche compares 2 Sam. ix. 7, 10, 11, 13; Luke xxii. 30; but those passages speak of persons eating at a table. The dative, or the reading of Codd. 34, 49, al., ἐν τῇ τραπέζῃ, seems better). For a parallel to the doings of the priests, see Aristoph. 'Plutus,' iii. 2. The scene is the temple of Aesculapius. "At length the sacristan, having put out the lights, ordered us to go to sleep; and charged us, if we heard any noise, not to cry out. We then lay down all of us in a very orderly manner; but I could not sleep. . . . Then looking up, I saw the priest greedily snatching away the cakes and figs from the sacred table; after which, he took his rounds about the altars, to see if there was any loaf left, and consecrated all he found—into a wallet which he carried for that purpose." (Fielding and Young's translation, p. 214.)

22. delivered Bel into Daniel's power.] ἔδωκε τὸν βὴλ ἔκδοτον τῷ Δ. For the Gk. phrase, see Demosth. 648. 25; and cf. Acts ii. 23. The present passage is the only reference in Trommius. Syr. W., Arab.: "gave Bel as a gift to Daniel."

who destroyed.] "And he overthrew." "Temple" is τὸ ἱερὸν, which sometimes denotes the edifice as distinct from the τέμενος or sacred enclosure, and sometimes the group of sacred buildings as contrasted with the ναὸς or temple proper. Here the word is used as equivalent to ναὸς (which Codd. XII., 26, 34, read). Cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 4; Ezek. xxviii. 18, xlv. 19; 1 Macc. x. 43, 84; xi. 4. Of course the assertion that Daniel was thus permitted to destroy Bel and his temple is merely part of the Haggada. According to Hdt. (i. 183), Xerxes plundered the temple; according to Strabo (xvi. 1) and Arrian ('Exped. Alex.' vii. 17), he destroyed it. Alexander intended to restore it. We know also from authentic inscriptions of the period that the historical Cyrus assumed a very different attitude towards the gods of Babylon from that here supposed in the interest of the legend. The slaughter of the priests may be compared with that of the "wise men of Babylon" (Dan. ii. 12), and that of Daniel's accusers (Dan. vi. 24).

23. great dragon.] Homer uses δράκων =ὄφις, 'Il.' ii. 200–208; and this appears to be the fundamental conception, which becomes so greatly distorted in the fabulous dragon. The serpent is a very ancient figure in mythology. Thus Egyptian myth tells of a great dragon Apepi ("he who mounts up"), who has no eyes, nose, or ears, but roars as he comes along. Apepi is the storm-cloud, and he is overcome by the fire and flinty sword of the Sun-god, and is forced back into his cavern, and over him is placed a stone "of forty cubits," while the devouring flame preys upon his bones. (Vid. a learned and interesting article by Mr. Le Page Renouf in 'Trans. Soc. Bibl. Arch.,' vol. viii. pt. 2.) We find traces of similar ideas in the Hebrew Scriptures, where they are apparently used consciously as mere poetic imagery, e.g. Job xxvi. 13, "By his breath (wind) the skies are beauty; his hand pierceth the fugitive serpent;" Isa. li. 9, xxvii. 1; Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14; Ezek. xxix. 3. Among the Babylonian inscriptions preserved in the British Museum there is a fragmentary account of a fight between Bel and the monster Tiâmat (the sea—תהום—personified); and Berosus (apud Euseb. 'Chron.' i.) describes how Belus cut Ὁμόρωκα Θαλάτθ in two, and formed heaven and earth out of the two halves, destroyed the sea-monsters who were the offspring of the union of the primeval waters of Apsû and Tiâmat, and then struck off his own head. The other gods mixed the blood that flowed from Bel with earth, and so fashioned man.

Copyright © by Thomas Nelson

24 And the king said unto Daniel, Wilt thou also say that this is of brass? lo, he liveth, he eateth and drinketh; thou canst not say that he is no living god: therefore worship him.

25 Then said Daniel unto the king, I will worship the Lord my God: for he is the living God.

26 But give me leave, O king, and I shall slay this dragon without sword or staff. The king said, I give thee leave.

27 Then Daniel took pitch, and fat, and hair, and did seethe them together, and made lumps thereof: this he put in the dragon's mouth, and so the dragon burst in sunder: and Daniel said, ‖Lo, these are the gods ye worship.

‖ Or, Behold what ye worship.

28 When they of Babylon heard that, they took great indignation, and

The "dragon" of our text is not described, but is obviously intended to be understood of a living creature, probably a large sacred serpent. It is true that such worship is not known to have been practised at Babylon; but the purpose of our Haggada is to ridicule idolatry and to magnify Daniel, not to teach history. (Cf. Wisdom xv. 18.) At the same time, we know from the monuments that the Babylonians had a snake-deity, whom they called ilu Çir, "the Serpent-god" (1 R. 70, col. 1, 13. 21); and that, side by side with the winged man-headed bulls, at the gates of cities, temples, and palaces, huge serpents of stone and bronze were erected as protecting powers. (Nebuch. India House Inscr. vi. 5, 16, 17; Phillipps Cyl. i. 44; Nerigl. i. 21 sqq.; Diod. Sic. ii. 9.) Living serpents, like crocodiles, cats, and other animals, were worshipped in Egypt (Aelian. 'de Animal.' xi. 17); and a sacred serpent was kept in the temple of Aesculapius at Epidaurus (Val. Max. i. 8), which the Romans sent to fetch on occasion of a plague. It will be noticed that both in East and West the serpent symbolised a beneficent, not a malignant power.

24. thou canst not say . . . god.] Added by Theod. Cf. note on v. 6 supra. Verse 25 is also wanting in the LXX. Cf. Deut. vi. 13; Matt. iv. 10; Dan. vi. 20, 26 ("living god"); 1 Thess. i. 9.

26. give me leave.] "Leave" is ἐξουσία, "delegated authority," as in N. T. of the authority Christ received from His Father. For "slay" (ἀποκτενῶ) the LXX. has "take off," "get rid of" (ἀνελῶ); and for "sword" (μαχαίρας), "iron" (σιδήρου), which in Job v. 20 renders חרב, "sword;" cf. ferrum. For the combination "sword or staff," cf. 1 Sam. xvii. 40, 43, 45, 47; Matt. xxvi. 47, 55.

I give thee leave.] Δίδωμί σοι, scil. ἐξουσίαν. LXX., "And the king yielded to him (συνεχώρησεν αὐτῷ), and said to him, It is given thee" (δέδοταί σοι).

27. pitch.] LXX., "of pitch thirty minas." The μνᾶ was originally a Babylonian weight —the mana of the inscriptions, and the מנה, mānèh, of the Bible. Cf. 1 Macc. xiv. 24. Theod. omits the weight, probably because it seemed too large a dose; but then the "dragon" is conceived as large.

lumps.] μᾶζας. Cod. Chis. μᾶζαν; Vulg., massas. The Gk. term means "cakes" (Arist., 'Knights,' 55). Trommius cites the present passage only. The Syr. texts have a Syriacized form of σφαῖρας, i.e. "round cakes." Syr. W. adds: "and the dragon swallowed them." According to Josippon ben Gorion, Daniel fastened a number of iron combs together, back to back, and baited the teeth with lumps of flesh and fat, smearing the parts of them that remained visible with pitch and sulphur, to hide them. This mass he threw into the mouth of the dragon, which swallowed it; and when the bait had dissolved, the iron teeth pierced its stomach, and the creature died miserably on the following day. This may represent an older, as it certainly is a more reasonable, form of the story. "Lumps of pitch and fat and hair" would not make an animal "burst," though they might perhaps choke it.

Lo, these are the gods ye worship.] ἴδετε τὰ σεβάσματα ὑμῶν, "behold ye your deities!" (objects of reverence and worship): cf. Acts xvii. 23; Wisdom xiv. 20, xv. 17. The LXX. has: "And he shewed him to the king, saying, Is it not these things (such helpless, crazy objects) that ye worship, O king?" A stinging question (οὐ ταῦτα σέβεσθε; nonne haec veneramini?). The plural generalizes the term; and this remark applies to Theodotion's ἴδετε. Or we may explain, "Behold, thou and thy people!" Ἴδε, ἰδού are therefore needless corrections. Syr. W.: "O Babylonians!"

28. When they of Babylon.] "And it came to pass, when the Babylonians heard, they were sore displeased (ἠγανάκτησαν λίαν: cf. Wisdom xii. 27), and they conspired . . . (συνεστράφησαν, "united," "clubbed together," 2 Kings ix. 14, xxi. 23; Thucyd. iv. 68, viii. 54) and said." LXX.: "and they of the country (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς χώρας) came together all against Daniel and said."

conspired against the king, saying, The king is become a Jew, and he hath destroyed Bel, he hath slain the dragon, and put the priests to death.

29 So they came to the king, and said, Deliver us Daniel, or else we will destroy thee and thine house.

30 Now when the king saw that they pressed him sore, being constrained, he [b]delivered Daniel unto them : [b] Dan. 6. 16.

31 Who cast him into the lions' den : where he was six days.

32 And in the den there were seven lions, and they had given them every day ‖two carcases, and two ‖ Or, two slaves.

The king is become a Jew.] So Syr. The context is against Grotius' rendering, "A Jew has become king" (he strikes out the article). The saying put into the mouth of the people is perfectly just and suited to the supposed circumstances. For "Jew," cf. Dan. iii. 12; 2 Kings xxv. 25; Esth. viii. 17 (ἰουδαΐζω, Judaizo, התיהד). "Destroyed" is κατέσπασε, "dragged down" (2 Kings x. 27; 2 Chron. xxiii. 17). The LXX. has κατέστρεψε, as in v. 22.

and put the priests to death.] κατέσφαξε, "slaughtered" them. The clause is suitably added by Theod.

29. destroy thee and thine house.] "Kill thee and thy family." The LXX. text of the verse is: "And the king seeing that the mob (ὄχλος) of the country had come together against him (ἐπ' αὐτὸν, against Daniel), called his fellow-livers and said, I give Daniel unto destruction" (δίδωμι τὸν Δ. εἰς ἀπώλειαν. Ezek. xxix. 10, xxxii. 15; cf. Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29). We have to think of a popular rising; but even so, the menace addressed to the Great King hardly appears probable when we remember the strength of Oriental despotism. The Haggadist is profoundly unconscious of the absurdity of supposing that the recently subjugated Babylonians could venture thus to threaten their conqueror.

30. Now when the king.] With the king's unwillingness to sacrifice Daniel, cf. Dan. vi. 14, 15. The verse is added by Theod. The LXX. continues: "Now there was a den (λάκκος, "pit;" גב, Dan. vi. 8, &c.) in which seven lions were kept (Dan. iv. 12), unto which they that plotted against the king (οἱ ἐπίβουλοι τοῦ βασιλέως) used to be delivered up, and there were provided (ἐχορηγεῖτο, Judith xii. 2) for them day by day of the condemned (τῶν ἐπιθανατίων, Dionys. Hal. vii. 35) two bodies" (σώματα. The term need not denote "corpse." It is used for the "living body," "person," "human being," and in later usage for "slave." Cf. Gen. xxxvi. 6; Tob. x. 10; Rev. xviii. 13; Polyb. xii. 16. 5).

The number seven is noticeable, as also the reference to "plotters against the king." Here as elsewhere it would be easy to decide in favour of the priority and higher originality of the LXX. text, even in the absence of external evidence.

31. Who . . . where.] "But they . . . and he was there." As to the lions' "den," Fritzsche observes that in Dan. vi. it is a mere cistern, whereas here it is a proper den or vivarium, into which people looked down from above. We fail to see the difference he suggests. Both accounts seem to indicate a partly subterranean chamber; and it is certainly difficult to understand how lions could live for any length of time under such cramped conditions as Dan. vi. 17 implies. LXX.: "And the throngs (οἱ ὄχλοι) cast Daniel into that pit, in order that he might be devoured, and might not even meet with burial." The last particular, omitted by Theod., is important in several respects. The ancients generally considered the lack of customary obsequies to be the greatest calamity and dishonour. (Cf. the plot of Sophocles' 'Antigone;' and Horace, 'Carm.' I. xxviii. See also 2 Macc. xiii. 7; ix. 15.) In the latter place it is said of Antiochus Epiphanes that he had not judged the Jews worthy of burial, but "to be cast out with their children to be devoured of the fowls and wild beasts." Dr. Neubauer, in the preface to his 'Book of Tobit,' mentions "the frequent and strange allusion to a secret burial of dead men, the special demand of Tobi to bury him and his wife in honour, the lamentation of Sarah that she had no one to bury her parents," as special phenomena of that beautiful story, whence he concludes that it belongs to a time when the Jews were prohibited from practising their peculiar rites of burial. We agree with this, though we cannot accept the date which, after Grätz, he assigns to the work in question. But we think that we may in like manner conclude from the present indication, taken along with 2 Macc. ix. 15, that this story of Bel and the Dragon belongs to the times following upon the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes.

six days.] On the occasion Dan. vi. 19, he "continued not in the pit save one night," as the Midrash remarks. (See Introd.)

32. every day.] τὴν ἡμέραν, an unusual expression. Properly "during the day," i.e. during each day, the article being distributive in sense.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

sheep: which then were not given to them, to the intent they might devour Daniel.

33 Now there was in Jewry a prophet, called Habbacuc, who had Or, sod. [b]made pottage, and had broken bread in a bowl, and was going into the field, for to bring it to the reapers.

34 But the angel of the Lord said unto Habbacuc, Go, carry the dinner that thou hast into Babylon unto Daniel, who is in the lions' den.

35 And Habbacuc said, Lord, I never saw Babylon; neither do I know where the den is.

36 Then the angel of the Lord
Ezek. 8. took him by the crown, and [c]bare him by the hair of his head, and through the vehemency of his spirit set him in Babylon over the den.

37 And Habbacuc cried, saying, O Daniel, Daniel, [d]take the dinner [d] 1 Kings 17. 4. which God hath sent thee.

38 And Daniel said, Thou hast remembered me, O God: neither hast thou forsaken them that seek thee and love thee.

39 So Daniel arose, and did eat: and the angel of the Lord set Habbacuc in his own place again immediately.

40 Upon the seventh day the king went to bewail Daniel: and when he came to the den, he looked in, and, behold, Daniel was sitting.

41 Then cried the king with a two carcases.] "Bodies," "persons;" perhaps condemned criminals or slaves: cf. Rev. xviii. 13.

which then were not given.] This aggravation of the lions' natural ferocity reminds us of the sevenfold heating of the furnace above what was requisite (Dan. iii. 19).

33. Now there was . . .] Lit. "and Habakkuk (Gk. Ambakoum) the prophet was in Judea, and he had seethed a seething" (ἥψησεν ἕψεμα, Gen. xxv. 29; 2 Kings iv. 38; Hagg. ii. 12). LXX., Syr. H.: "And it came to pass on the sixth day that Habakkuk had loaves (so Theod. ἄρτους) broken (ἐντεθρυμμένους, "crumbled;" the proper word for making sop) in a bowl, in a seething (ἐν ἑψήματι), and a jar (στάμνος, Arist. 'Plut.' 545; 1 Kings xiv. 3) of wine mingled, and was going into the field unto the reapers."

34. the angel of the Lord.] This is right, though the Gk. is ἄγγελος κυρίου, for that expression = מלאך יהוה. Susanna 42. As to "dinner"—ἄριστον—see Susanna 13, note. LXX.: "And the angel of the Lord spake unto Habakkuk, saying, Thus saith the Lord God unto thee," &c.; and in the next verse Habakkuk replies, "Lord God."

36. through the vehemency of his spirit.] ἐν τῷ ῥοίζῳ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ. Cf. Ezek. xlvii. 5; Wisdom v. 11; for ῥοῖζος, which may mean any whistling or rushing sound, as of arrows, wings, winds, &c.; and (2) a rushing motion, rush. Syr. W. and Midrash Bereshith Rabba: "in the might of the Holy Ghost;" but the Vulg. comes nearer, in impetu spiritus sui. The reference is to the swiftness of the angel's panting flight. Cf. Dan. ix. 21; Ezek. viii. 3: "And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head; and a spirit (or a wind) lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem." LXX.: "And the angel of the Lord having laid hold of him, to wit, of Habakkuk, by the hair of his head, set him over the den in Babylon." Cf. 1 Kings xviii. 12; 2 Kings ii. 11, 16; Ezek. iii. 12, 14; Acts viii. 39: "The Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip," where Cod. A has "an angel of the Lord." Ps. civ. 4.

37, 38. LXX., Syr. H.: "And Habakkuk said unto Daniel, Arise and eat the dinner which the Lord God hath sent thee. And Daniel said, Yea, for the Lord God, who forsaketh not them that love him, hath remembered me" (ἐμνήσθη γάρ. So Theod. ἐμνήσθης γάρ. Cf. 1 Thess. ii. 20).

39. LXX., Syr. H.: "And Daniel did eat. But the angel of the Lord conducted (κατέστησε, Acts xvii. 15) Habakkuk (to the place) whence he took him, on the same day: but the Lord God remembered Daniel."

set . . . again.] ἀπεκατέστησε, "restored," "carried back" (Jer. xvi. 15; Gen. xxix. 3; Judith vi. 10).

40, 41. LXX.: "But the king went forth after these things, bewailing Daniel, and having stooped down to peep into the pit (ἐγκύψας εἰς . . .) he seeth him sitting." Cf. Dan. vi. 26. Syr. W. omits the last clause of v. 41.

Digitized by Microsoft®

loud voice, saying, Great art thou, O Lord God of Daniel, and there is none other beside thee.

42 [e]And he drew him out, [f]and cast those that were the cause of his destruction into the den: and they were devoured in a moment before his face.

[e] Jer. 37. 17.
[f] Dan. 6. 24.

42. drew him out.] "up"—ἀνέσπασεν. So Syr. W.; but LXX., Syr. H.: "And the king brought Daniel forth out of the pit."

before his face.] I.e. Daniel's. See LXX.: "And those that were the cause of his destruction he cast into the pit before Daniel, and they were devoured." Cf. Dan. vi. 24. The Vulgate adds: Tunc rex ait: Paveant omnes habitantes in universa terra Deum Danielis: quia ipse est salvator, faciens signa et mirabilia in terra; qui liberavit Danielem de lacu leonum. This conclusion, borrowed from Dan. vi. 26, 27, fitly expresses the moral of both stories—a moral of which the sterling value is not sensibly diminished by the historical improbability of a Median or Persian monarch decreeing universal homage to the God of Israel.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE PRAYER OF MANASSES.

א״ר יוחנן כל האומר מנשה אין לו חלק לעה״ב מרפה ידיהן של בעלי תשובה :

"Said R. Johanan: Whoso saith, 'Manasseh hath no part in the world to come,' discourageth the penitent."—Sanhedr. 103 A, line 1.

IN 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1 seq. we are told that Manasseh, the son and successor of Hezekiah, king of Judah, zealously restored the polytheism abolished by his father, even setting up "the graven image of the idol which he had made in the house of God" at Jerusalem (v. 7). "And the Lord spake to Manasseh and to his people [by prophets]; but they would not hearken. Wherefore the Lord brought upon them the captains of the host of the king of Assyria, which took Manasseh with the hooks [Amos iv. 2; Isa. xxxvii. 29], and bound him with the double chain of copper, and carried him to Babylon. And when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers, and prayed unto him: and he vouchsafed him grace, and heard his supplication, and brought him again to Jerusalem into his kingdom. Then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God" (vv. 10–13). The narrative then describes the amends made by the restored sovereign, and concludes with an explicit reference to the sources of the story: "Now the rest of the history of Manasseh, and his prayer unto his God, and the words of the seers that spake to him in the name of the Lord God of Israel, behold, they are written in the History of the Kings of Israel. And his prayer, and the grace vouchsafed him, and all his sin and his treachery (to God), and the places wherein he built high places, and set up the Ashērim and the graven images, before he was humbled: behold, they are written in the History of the Seers" [or Hozai = Hozaiah; a particular seer. In any case a section of the great History of the Kings of Israel]. Eminent scholars and critics, like De Wette, Graf, and Nöldeke,[1] have thrown suspicion upon this account, basing their objections partly on the silence of the Book of Kings, and partly upon supposed internal evidence. The former argument is hardly worth noticing. As to the latter, it was asserted that history was against the implied supremacy of Assyria in Western Asia at the period in question (the first half of the 7th cent. B.C.); exception was taken to the statement that the officers of an Assyrian king had carried their captive to Babylon, and not to Nineveh, the Assyrian capital; and, apart from these supposed errors of fact, it was declared to be wholly improbable that Manasseh should first have been loaded with chains and treated with such indignity as the text represents, and then restored to his former kingly state. But these difficulties, which used to be asserted with such confidence by assailants of the Chronicler's historical veracity, have disappeared in the light unexpectedly contributed by cuneiform discovery. We now know that Ashûra-ḥiddîn (Esarhaddon), the son of Sana-ḥîrîb or Sennacherib, king of Assyria (681–668 B.C.), rebuilt Babylon, which his father had razed to the ground (B.C. 691), and held his court there during six months of the year.[2] Further than this, "Manasseh, king of the land (or city) of Judah"—Menasê (Minsê) shar mât (or âl) Ya'ûdî—is actually mentioned in a list of twenty-two kings of Phœnicia-Palestine and Cyprus, who, as vassals of Esarhaddon, contributed materials for the building of his palace at Nineveh.[1] Professor Sayce thinks that it was Esarhaddon who had Manasseh conveyed as a prisoner to Babylon, after crushing his revolt.[2] But the inscription referred to, as Schrader observes, says nothing of any rebellion in Palestine; and, upon the whole, it appears more probable that Manasseh either participated, or was suspected of participating, in the general rising of Shamash-shum-ukin, viceroy of Babylon and brother of Ashûrbânapli (Assurbanipal), the son and successor of Esarhaddon, circ. 648 B.C. Assurbanipal himself informs us that not only Elam, Guti, and Meluḫḫê (Meroe or Ethiopia), but also mât Aḫarri, "the land of the west," or Phœnicia-Palestine, was implicated in this revolt.[3] After the overthrow of Shamash-shum-ukîn (Gk. Saosduchinos or Sammughes), and the assumption by Ashurbanapli of the Babylonian sceptre, it is natural to suppose that the Great King sometimes resided at his second capital, and that on one of these occasions Manasseh was brought in chains before him, to answer the charges laid against him. The inscriptions expressly state that Ashurbanapli received a Cypriote embassy at Babylon after his victory.

[1] See Schenkel's 'Bibellexicon,' s. v. Manass. According to Nöldeke, the story is an edifying fiction, intended to moderate the impression produced by the otherwise unbroken prosperity of so wicked a king.

[2] Vid. Sayce, 'Herod.' App. ii. p. 382.

The last objection of the critics is met by an exactly parallel case. In Smith's 'Abp.' 43, 45, we read: "Shar-lûdâri (and) Nîkû they seized; with bands of iron, (and) fetters of iron, they made fast (their) hands and feet." Afterwards, when Nîkû (Necho) had been carried thus to Nineveh, Ashurbanapli "granted him grace," and allowed him to return to his vassal-kingdom of Saïs and Memphis in Egypt. Schrader supposes that Manasseh was taken to Babylon in the year 647 B.C.[4]

Assuming, then, as we are fully entitled to do, the good faith of the Chronicler, it is evident from the references in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 18, 19, that a Prayer of Manasseh, written in Hebrew, lay before that writer; and we may perhaps venture to add that there is nothing in the form or substance of the prayer before us which can fairly be alleged against the possibility of its having been ultimately derived from that lost Hebrew original. The ancient Church believed the prayer to be authentic, and read it with other Scriptures. Fritzsche, however, declares that though the Greek style of the piece is Hebraizing (hebraisirende), it is evidently not a translation. He considers the prayer to be a later production based upon the story in Chronicles, and in this respect to be classed in the same category with the Additions to Esther, ch. ii.–iv. 6, and the Addition to Dan. iii. 23 (Prayer of Azarias and Song of the Three Children). We hesitate to accept Fritzsche's dictum on this point without reserve: for although the Greek proves the writer to have possessed a fair command of that language, such proficiency as it evinces was not impossible to an Hellenistic Jew; and the writer may have taken pains to soften down the harshness of a baldly literal version. Besides, it seems unlikely that so short a piece should have survived for so long a period as Fritzsche allows, if it had from the first stood isolated, as it stands at present, from any historical context. We incline to think that the Greek is a free translation from some lost Haggadic narrative, which was itself perhaps founded upon the older document from which the Chronicler derived his peculiar details of the history of Manasseh. Fritzsche himself has given certain references to Jewish and Christian sources, to which we may add one or two others from the Talmud, which seem to indicate the former existence of a more copious and in part legendary account of Manasseh's captivity and deliverance. In the 'Apostolical Constitutions,' ii. 22—the earliest known citation of the Prayer—it is given with the addition: "And the Lord hearkened to his voice, and there became about him a flame of fire, and all the irons about him melted." In S. John Damascene[1] we read: "Scholion. It is related in [Julius] Africanus that while Manasseh was saying a psalm [ᾠδὴν,

[1] See 'The Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia,' vol. i. 47. 5, 11; vol. iii. 16. 12 sqq.;—and Mr. E. A. Budge's 'Hist. of Esarhaddon,' pp. 78, 102 sqq.

[2] 'Fresh Light from the Ancient Monuments,' p. 152.

[3] Smith's 'Abp.' 154. 33 sqq.

[4] Vid. 'Die Keilinschr. und das Alt. Test.' 2nd edit., pp. 369–372.

[1] 'Parall.' ii. 15 (Opp. ii. p. 463).

Digitized by Microsoft®

i.e. his Prayer], his bonds, though of iron, burst asunder, and he escaped." Anastasius in Ps. vi. writes: "The ancient historiographers affirm that Manasseh, the king of Israel, when carried away by the Chaldeans, in Babylon of Persis was confined in a brazen figure [κατεκλείσθη εἰς ζώδιον χαλκοῦν—like the Bull of Phalaris], by the king of the Persians, and being within, in such a figure, he prayed with tears."[1] Suidas (from Cedrenus), s. v. Μανασσῆς: "Wherefore . . . by Merodach [Marduḵ, the tutelar god of Babylon] he was carried away captive in bonds to the city of Nineveh [the Assyrian capital: vid. supra], and was shut into the Brazen Statue [κ. ἐς τὸ χαλκοῦν ἄγαλμα καθείρχθη] . . . he besought the Lord . . . and the statue by divine power burst asunder, &c. . . . But to him bound, being in prison in brazen fetters in Babylon, they used to give scant bread made of bran, and a little water with poor wine measured out (σὺν ὄξει μετρητῷ), to keep him alive, and no more. [This last sentence occurs also in the 'Apost. Constit.'] And then he prayed to the Lord, 'O Lord Almighty,'" &c. (See Targum, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11.)[2]

In the Talmud, Manasseh is adduced as a gross example of the scoffer, the idolater, the unclean person, and as an extreme case of the value of penitence. Sanhedrin, 99 B: "Our Rabbis have taught (Num. xv. 30), 'And the soul that dealeth with a high hand'—This is Manasseh, son of Hezekiah, who was sitting and delivering offensive expositions. He said: 'What! had Moses nothing else to write but (Gen. xxxvi. 22) "And the sister of Lotan was Timna, and Timna was concubine to Eliphaz;" (or Gen. xxx. 14) "And Reuben went in the days of wheat harvest, and found mandrakes in the field"?' Came forth the Bath Qol, and said unto him: 'Thou sittest, against thy brother thou speakest; against thy mother's son thou utterest offence. These things thou hast done,' &c. (Ps. l. 20, 21). And of him is interpreted by tradition, 'Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity,' &c. (Isa. v. 18)." See also Sanh. 103 B.: "Our Rabbis have taught that Manasseh made fifty and five changes in the Law of the Priests, according to the years of his reign." [Rashi explains: "He innovated in the Book of Leviticus every year, and expounded it captiously"—ודורשו מפילפולו.]

A few lines below, 2 Kings xxi. 16 is quoted, with the remark, "This they interpret of his having killed Isaiah." Further on it is said that Rabbi Johanan explained the "graven image" and "graven images" of 2 Chron. xxxiii. 7, 19, in this wise: "At first he made for it (the idol) one face, and in the end he made for it four faces, that the Shekhina might see and be provoked." "Manasseh erased the Azkarôth [the Divine Name, יהוה, wherever it was written], and overturned the Altar." "Manasseh went in unto his own sister."

The manner of Isaiah's death is described, Jebamoth, 49 B.

According to Rabbi Aha bar Amê, the fire that came down from heaven in Solomon's days was not withdrawn [לא נסתלקה] from the Brazen Altar until Manasseh came. Then it departed.

In Sanhedr. 103 A, line 3, it is gathered from comparison of 2 Kings xxi. 1, 3, with 1 Kings xvi. 29, that "Manasseh wrought repentance thirty-three years." It is added that, according to R. Johanan, the Lord "made a kind of aperture [מחתרת] in the firmament, in order to receive him in repentance, because of the Property of Justice" [מפני מידת הדין]: in other words, the Property of Mercy could only be indulged surreptitiously, in the case of so flagrant a sinner. The argument turns on the substitution of ויחתר לו, "and he made a hole for him," for ויעתר לו, "and he vouchsafed him grace" (2 Chron. xxxiii. 13).

Lastly, in Sanhedr. 101 A, we read the following story: "Our Rabbis have taught that when R. Eliezer was sick, four Elders went in to visit him, viz. R. Tarphôn and R. Joshua and R. Eliezer ben Azariah and R. Aqîba. Answered R. Tarphôn and said: 'Better art thou to Israel than a drop of rain, which is a drop of rain in this world; but Rabbi

[1] Canisius, 'Thesaur. Monum.' ed. Basnage, i. 495, date 1725.

[2] Translated at the end of the commentary. See also Fabricius, 'Bibliotheca Graeca,' ed. Harless, iii. p. 733, hh.

Digitized by Microsoft®

(is better) in this world and in the world to come.' Answered R. Joshua and said: 'Better art thou to Israel than the sun's orb, which is such in this world, but Rabbi (is better) in this world and in the world to come.' Answered R. E. ben Azariah and said: 'Better art thou to Israel than father and mother, who are father and mother in this world, but Rabbi,' &c. Answered R. Aqîba and said: 'Precious are chastisements.' (The sick Rabbi) said to them, 'Prop me up, that I may listen to the words of my disciple Aqîba, who hath said, Precious are chastisements.' Aqîba said unto him: 'How can you prove that saying?' He said, 'I explain the text (2 Kings xxi. 1) "Manasseh was twelve years old when he began to reign, and he reigned fifty-five years in Jerusalem. And he did the Evil in the eyes of the Lord:" and the Scripture (Prov. xxv. 1): "These are also Proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out." Could Hezekiah teach the Law to all the world universally, and fail to teach the Law to Manasseh his son? but after all the pains he took with him, and after all the labour he bestowed on him, nothing brought him to well-doing, but chastisements: as it is said (2 Chron. xxxiii. 10–13), "And the Lord spake to Manasseh . . . And when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord, &c. Then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God." There! Thou hast learned that chastisements are precious.'"

I am tempted to translate what immediately follows this story. "Our Rabbis have taught, Three are they who came (before God) with cunning (באו בעלילה): they are Cain, Esau, and Manasseh. Cain, as it is written (Gen. iv. 13), 'My sin is too great for pardon.' Quoth he, before the Lord of the World, 'What! is my sin greater than that of the 600,000 who will hereafter sin before Thee, and Thou wilt pardon them?' Esau, as it is written (Gen. xxvii. 38), 'Hast thou but one blessing, my father?' Manasseh at first called upon many gods, and at last called upon the God of his fathers." [Rashi: "He said, 'If thou save me not, what doth it profit me that I have called on thee, more than the other gods?'"] This passage contradicts others, in that it implies that Manasseh did not really repent, but prevailed upon God by challenging His superiority to idols.

Some of the added details in these passages (Manasseh's incest, his cavilling at Scripture, murder of Isaiah, &c.), taken along with those from the Greek writers cited above, appear to strengthen the supposition of the former existence of a Haggadic legend or group of legends about Manasseh, with which the Prayer before us may have been connected. However this may be, the Prayer is certainly the work of a Jew, and belongs, not as Bertholdt supposed, to the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D., but to a much earlier period. The ideas throughout are Jewish, and the same may be said of the distinctive form, which is that of a Hebrew Tephillah. As a psalm of penitence, it might perhaps have been composed in the stirring times of the Maccabean revolt, to which other portions of the so-called Apocrypha belong. In those trying times the Prayer would obviously suggest that the sincere penitence and trust in Jehovah which had been so effectual for Manasseh's deliverance might again prove similarly effective to the deliverance of the nation. Fritzsche refers the Prayer to about this period. Dr. Bissell follows him, asserting that "there are no traces whatever of its being a translation." Perhaps not, if we conclude thus from the absence of awkward and clumsy expressions, and obvious misunderstandings of Hebrew terms and phrases, such as may be pointed out in other Apocryphal texts; and from the presence of participial constructions, and the use of certain particles, which are not common in highly Hebraized Greek. But all this, as we have said, may only prove that the possible translator knew both languages well. Fürst believes the Prayer to be a version of the lost Hebrew original; and Ewald thinks it not impossible that it is a survival from the דברי חוזי (2 Chron. xxxiii. 19). Bertholdt, on the other hand, found proof of its late origin in the exaggerated idea it expresses of the merits of the Three Patriarchs, and in such non-biblical phrases as ὁ θεὸς τῶν δικαίων and θεὸς τῶν μετανοούντων. It is true that the first of these conceptions is peculiarly characteristic of Rabbinism. Yet the later Jewish theology, in laying such stress upon the merits of the Fathers, built at least upon a biblical foundation. Such a passage as Exod. xxxii. 13, where Moses prays, "Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants," might easily suggest, taken along with its context, that the merits of the Patriarchs could avail for their posterity. Even the self-revelation of God as "the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham," &c. (Exod. iii. 6) might be so understood; and the conception would be further strengthened by such passages as Gen. xviii. 26 sqq., xix. 29; 1 Kings xi. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 35, xli. 8, li. 1, 2; Ezek. xiv. 14, 20; Ps. cxxxii. 1, 10; 2 Chron. xx. 7. Anyone who remembers the frequent and emphatic assertions of personal integrity made in the Psalms, and such passages as Gen. vi. 9, xvii. 1 (cited in the Talmud Nedarim, 32 A; Sanhedr. 108 A; Erubin, 18 B), will hardly be much surprised at the Rabbinical inference of the sinlessness of the three patriarchs, and other great personages of antiquity, such as Moses and Aaron (Shabbath, 55 B), David and Solomon, and even others of less worthy fame (Shabbath, 55 B, 56). Cf. also Baba Bathra, 17 A, where it is declared that the יצר הרע, or innate inclination to evil, had no power over Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

Digitized by Microsoft®

As for the other two phrases, although neither occurs in the O. T., it would be easy to shew that each merely formulates O. T. ideas. The Psalmists constantly base their appeals for Divine help on the ground that the righteous God cannot but favour the righteous, and frown upon the wicked. In their thought, and almost in their words, Jehovah is emphatically "the God of the righteous."

Similar remarks would apply to the second phrase; a fact which was fully perceived by Rabbi Johanan when he said (Berach. 34 B): כל הנביאים כולן לא נתנבאו אלא לבעלי תשובה, "All the prophets prophesied not but with reference to penitents." Cf. the Penitential Psalms, and Isa. lvii. 15, lxvi. 2, among a host of other passages.

Clearly, then, the internal evidence of the Prayer does not necessitate the late origin supposed by Bertholdt. The fact that 'Apost. Constit.' ii. 22 contains the earliest citation of it led J. A. Fabricius to conjecture that the author of that work was the author of the Prayer. But, as already observed, the writer of the Prayer was a Jew, not a Christian; and the text as given in the 'Apost. Constit.,' though mostly conciding with that of the biblical MSS., is inferior in one or two places (ed. P. A. Delagarde, Lipsiae—Londinii 1862).

A Hebrew version from the Greek may be seen in Wolf's 'Bibl. Hebr.' i. 778.

The usual position of the Prayer in Greek MSS. is among the Hymns appended to the Book of Psalms; it is so, for instance, in the Codex Alexandrinus, in the Zürich Psalter, and in the Ethiopic version of the Psalms edited by J. Ludolf (Frankfort, 1701, 4to). The Prayer is also given in the Ethiopic version of the 'Apostolical Constitutions,' which was made from the Greek (ed. Thomas Pell Platt. London, 1834). Its genuine worth, as being no mere cento of scriptural phrases, but an original composition in the manner of the Penitential and Supplicatory Psalms, would naturally lead to its adoption into liturgical use, and its transference from the original setting to the appendix to the Psalter. Since the Council of Trent, it has been relegated along with 3 and 4 Esdras to the end of the Vulgate. In my copy (Paris, 1860) it is given after some indexes, with a prefatory note that, though excluded from the Canon by the Council of Trent, it and the two Books of Esdras are here added, "lest they should become altogether lost; inasmuch as they are occasionally cited by some Fathers, and are found in some Latin MSS. of the Bible, as well as printed copies."

The common Greek text is good, and is supported by the well-executed Latin version, which, as not due to S. Jerome, may be designated Old Lat., though it is later than and superior to that version elsewhere. There are, besides, Arabic MSS. of the 'Apostolical Constitutions' containing the Prayer. Vid. the catalogues of the British Museum and the Bodleian Library.

THE

PRAYER OF MANASSES

KING OF JUDAH,

When he was holden captive in Babylon.

B. C. cir. 676. O LORD, Almighty God of our fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of their righteous seed; who hast made heaven and earth, with all the ornament thereof; who hast bound the sea by the word of thy commandment; who hast shut up the deep, and sealed it by thy B. C. cir. 676.

In the Greek the heading is "Prayer of Manasses, son of Ezekias."

O Lord, Almighty God, &c.] The stopping is wrong. The comma should follow the word "Almighty." The words "O Lord, Almighty, &c. . . . importable" constitute the opening address or invocation of the prayer. (The following "but" should be cancelled.) "Lord Almighty" is the Gk. equivalent of Jahweh Sabaoth. Cod. III. adds ἐπουράνιε, "Heavenly One!" Cf. Dan. iv. 23. The term renders "Shaddai," Ps. lxviii. 14; cf. also Matt. xviii. 35. The "fathers" are named, because their merits were and are supposed by Jews to be efficacious for their descendants.

and of their righteous seed.] An advanced theological idea, according to which Jehovah is not the God of the Jews in general, but only of the righteous remnant. Below, He is addressed as "God of the just" or "righteous." Cf. also Rom. ix. 6–8; Ecclus. x. 19.

with all the ornament thereof.] Gk. σὺν πάντι τῷ κόσμῳ αὐτῶν, "with all the order of them;" an equivalent of the Heb. "with all the host of them" (Gen. ii. 1). Κόσμος represents צבא, the ordered host of heaven (i.e. the stars) in Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3; Isa. xxiv. 21, xl. 26. The Ethiopic has "world," which indicates a Greek original.

who hast bound the sea.] Or, "fettered," Job xxxvi. 8 (אסר). It was done with a mere word: Job xxxviii. 8–11; Gen. i. 9 (Ps. civ. 9). Ethiopic: "rebuked."

the deep.] τὴν ἄβυσσον = תהום (Gen. i. 2, vii. 11, viii. 2). The Gk. term seems to answer to the Assyrian Apsû, as תהום to Assyr. Ti'âmtu[m] or Ti'âmat. According to the Heb. conception, the earth rests on the fathomless deep: see Ps. xxiv. 2, xxxiii. 7, cxxxvi. 6; Job xxxviii. 6. The "sealing" of the deep signifies that its bounds are firmly secured, or inviolable. Cf. Rev. xx. 3, "Cast him into the bottomless pit (τὴν ἄβυσσον) and shut him up, and set a seal upon him;" Dan. vi. 17; Matt. xxvii. 66; Bel 14; Job ix. 7, "which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not; and sealeth up the stars." God sealed up the deep "with his terrible and glorious name;" in connexion with which, it may be remembered that a magical efficacy was attributed by the later Jews to the Divine Name or Tetragrammaton (יהוה). Solomon especially was credited with working many wonders by means of it. His seal was graven with the Ineffable Name. In the Talmud (Gittîn, 68 A) it is said that Ashmĕdai (Zend. Aeshmadaeva), the king of the demons (שידי), lived on a mountain, where was a well full of water, which was covered with a stone and sealed with his seal. "And every day he goeth up to the firmament. And the session (school) of the firmament endeth, and he comes down to the earth. And the session of the earth endeth, and he cometh and inspecteth his seal, and uncovereth it, and drinketh, and covereth it, and sealeth it, and departeth." Solomon having obtained this information from demons, "sent Benaiah ben Jehoiada, having given him a chain whereon was engraven the NAME, and a seal-ring (עזקתא) whereon was engraven the Name, and fleeces of wool, and skins of wine. He went and digged a cistern below, poured into it water, and concealed it with the fleeces of wool; and he dug a cistern above, and poured into it wine, and hid it. Then he went up and sat in the tree. When he (the demon) came, he inspected the seal, removed it, found the wine, said: It is written, 'Wine is a mocker,' &c., and it is written, 'Whoredom, wine, and new wine take away the heart:' I will not drink, for my thirst is not great. He drank, became drunk, and fell asleep. Benaiah came down (from the tree), and went and threw upon him the chain and sealed it.

B. C. cir. 676. terrible and glorious name; whom all men fear, and tremble before thy power; for the majesty of thy glory cannot be borne, and thine angry threatening toward sinners is importable: but thy merciful promise is unmeasurable and unsearchable; for thou art the most high Lord, [a] of great compassion, long-suffering, very merciful, and repentest of the evils of men. Thou, O Lord, according to thy great goodness hast promised B. C. cir. 676. [a] Ps. 86. 15. Joel 2. 13.

When he woke, he was in irons. Said Benaiah to him, 'The name of thy Lord is upon thee! The name of thy Lord is upon thee!'" whom all men fear.] Rather, "all things" (πάντα). "Fear" is φρίσσει, horret, Job iv. 15; which takes an accus. pers. vel rei, in the sense of "to shudder at" ('Il.' xi. 383; Judith xvi. 10).

tremble before thy power.] Τρέμειν also, like φρίσσειν, may take an accus. rei (Isa. lxvi. 2, 5); so that Fritzsche may be wrong in his remark, "Zu τρέμει ist ὀν nicht mehr zu beziehen;" and Schleussner right in explaining ἀπὸ προσώπου = propter, in which sense the Heb. מִפְּנֵי sometimes occurs (Gen. vi. 13; Judg. vi. 6; Isa. x. 27). As however verbs of fearing are usually joined with מִפְּנֵי = ἀπὸ προσώπου τινος, perhaps, after all, Fritzsche is right (so A. V.): see Judg. v. 5; 1 Sam. vii. 7.

the majesty . . . cannot be borne.] ἡ μεγαλοπρέπεια (Ps. cxlv. 5, 12, where the term is associated with "glory;" Ps. viii. 1, lxxi. 7). It represents other but synonymous Heb. terms. Cf. Arist. 'Eth. Nic.' iv. 2, 5. Ἀστεκτος, "insufferable;" Old Lat. importabilis. The word is rare. Trommius does not give it. Ethiopic: "For there is no end of the greatness of thy glory."

thine angry threatening.] Lit., "the anger of thy threatening against sinners;" a Hebraism. Ἀπειλὴ = זַעַם and זַעַף, ira; Hab. iii. 11; Prov. xix. 12. Also נְעָרָה, increpatio; Prov. xiii. 8, πτωχὸς δὲ οὐχ ὑφίσταται ἀπειλήν; compare ἀνυπόστατος, "importable," i.e. "insupportable," insustentabilis; 2 Macc. i. 13; Ps. cxxiv. 5, τὸ ὕδωρ ἀνυπόστατον (Heb. "the proud waters"). Ethiopic: "Fearful is the chastisement of thy wrath against sinners."

but thy merciful promise.] The "but" (δὲ) is due to the later editions. The MSS. have τε. The reading δὲ was, no doubt, suggested by the apparent need of a clause contrasting formally with v. 5: "Intolerable is the splendour of thy glory, &c. But immeasurable and unsearchable the mercy of thy promise" (so lit.). The Old Lat. thus has vero et. The reading τε implies the beginning of a direct sentence, after the manifold invocation of God by His different attributes: "O Lord Almighty, &c. Who madest, &c. Of whom all things are in awe, &c. Because the splendour of thy glory is intolerable, &c. Both immeasurable and unsearchable is the mercy of thy promise. For," &c. However, we cannot help thinking that the mention of mercy is really co-ordinate with that of "anger" in the former clause; and besides, God's mercy, as well as His wrath, may be properly alleged as a ground of the fear of Him: Ps. cxxx. 4. We may, therefore, assume that vv. 5–7 are subordinate to v. 4; and that the invocation really concludes with v. 7.

unmeasurable and unsearchable.] See Ecclus. xvi. 15; Rom. xi. 33; Isa. xxii. 18; Job v. 9, ix. 10.

for thou art the most high Lord.] Cf. Ps. xlvii. 2, xcvii. 9. Instead of σὺ γάρ, Cod. III. ὅτι σύ; Old Lat. quoniam tu; ? Heb. כִּי אַתָּה יְהוָה עֶלְיוֹן; Old Lat. altissimus super omnem terram (as Ps. xcvii. 9).

of great compassion.] εὔσπλαγχνος, a term of which Trommius gives no instance. See Eph. iv. 32; 1 Pet. iii. 8. For the next two epithets, μακρόθυμος κ. πολυέλεος, see Ps. lxxxvi. 15; Exod. xxxiv. 6; and the passages from Joel and Jonah infra. Ethiop. "merciful."

and repentest of the evils of men.] Fritzsche omits καὶ ("duce T."). But the words are really a quotation either from Joel ii. 13, μακρόθυμος κ. πολυέλεος καὶ μετανοῶν ἐπὶ ταῖς κακίαις, or from Jonah iv. 2, where the same expressions recur. The meaning is, "remorseful at the calamities of men," which He inflicts on them for their sins (Amos vii. 3, 6; 1 Chron. xxi. 15). The opening invocation ends here.

Thou, O Lord, according to thy great goodness.] Lit., "the multitude of thy goodness." Cf. Neh. xiii. 22; Ps. cxlv. 7. As to promises of repentance and forgiveness to "them that have sinned," the expression does not take away the moral initiative from the sinners themselves: but, as the next clause makes evident, it simply means to say that God's gracious promise has coupled forgiveness with repentance, making the one consequent upon the other: cf. Isa. i. 16 sqq.; Ezek. xviii. 21 sqq.; Hos. i. 10; ii.; vi. 1, 2; xiv. From another point of view, of course it is true that God gives the impulse to repentance, as well as the ensuing pardon. And in the present instance, as in that ideal one contemplated in Hos. ii., it was God's chastise-

B.C. cir. 676. repentance and forgiveness to them that have sinned against thee: and of thine infinite mercies hast appointed repentance unto sinners, that they may be saved. Thou therefore, O Lord, that art the God of the just, hast not appointed repentance to the just, as to Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, which have not sinned against thee; but thou hast appointed repentance unto me that am a sinner: for I have sinned above the number of the sands of the sea. My transgressions, O Lord, are multiplied: my transgressions are multiplied, and I am not worthy to behold and see the height of heaven for the multitude of mine iniquities. I am bowed down B.C. cir. 676.

ment which gave it. See Wisdom xii. 19: "Thou givest repentance for sins." Perhaps, however, "repentance" in this line refers to God, in the sense of "relenting." The participle was so used in the line before: "Thou hast promised that thou wilt relent and pardon." Then, in the next line, we have repentance on man's part: "And in the multitude of thy tender mercies"—an expression occurring in Ps. li. 1, lxix. 16—"hast appointed [or "didst appoint," "appointedst." The Heb. perfect = Gk. aor. and perfect] repentance to sinners for salvation" (εἰς σωτηρίαν. Rom. x. 1, 10; Exod. xv. 2; Job xiii. 16). Cf. our Lord's word: "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." The two lines, "Thou, O Lord . . . may be saved," are omitted in Codd. III., T. The text of the 'Apost. Const.' is here confused, and the Ethiopic version omits.

Thou therefore.] σὺ οὖν. The particle is equivalent to עתה (Exod. iii. 18, x. 17).

appointed.] Or "ordained"—ἔθου; Old Lat. posuisti; שמת (Job xxviii. 3; 2 Sam. vii. 10). In the former verse, the term was ὥρισας (Rom. i. 4). With the idea, compare our Lord's words just quoted, and Luke xv. 7, "ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance." But our Lord obviously used the term "righteous" or "just" in a relative sense; whereas here the mention of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with the qualification τοῖς οὐχ ἡμαρτηκόσιν σοι, plainly indicates something more. The truth is that, although the failings of the Patriarchs are not concealed in their histories (Gen. xii. 13, &c.), the Jewish mind of later times idealised them as perfect characters, whose merits were sufficient, not for themselves only, but also for their entire posterity. According to the Talmud, all Israel has part in the world to come (Moed Qaton, 9 A; Ketubb. 111 A; Sanhedr. 10 A, &c.); and "everything comes to Israel on account of the merits of the Fathers" (Siphrî on Deut., p. 108 B). The Jews appear, in fact, to have felt secure of the future, on the ground of their descent from Abraham (Matt. iii. 9; John viii. 33, 39). He sits at the gate of hell, to save any Israelite from entering it; for his merit avails even for the wicked (Ber. Rab., 48; Shabbath, 55 A). The merits of the Fathers, however, do not avail outside the land of Israel (Baba Bathra, 81 A). The language of this verse, therefore, proves the Jewish origin of the prayer.

unto me.] ἐπ' ἐμοί, as if "put repentance upon me." But Cod. III. omits ἐπί.

Ethiopic: "but turn thou (unto) the repentance of me a sinner."

that am a sinner.] Rather, "the sinner," above all others, κατ' ἐξοχήν. Luke xviii. 13: "God be merciful to me the sinner."

for I have sinned.] Or, "I sinned" (ἥμαρτον). For what follows, cf. Ps. xl. 5, 12; Job vi. 3. Instead of ψάμμος, the more classical form, the LXX. usually has ἄμμος. See Wisd. vii. 9 (Ecclus. xxii. 15) for the former.

The clause amplifies the expression τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ, with which the preceding clause terminates.

My transgressions.] Gk. ἐπλήθυναν αἱ ἀνομίαι μου, κύριε, ἐπλήθυναν. (Fr. omits αἱ ἀνομ. μου the second time, after Cod. Tur. Cod. III. and Apost. Const. omit κύριε ἐπληθ. as well. The Ethiopic has only: "and many are my sins," which it connects immediately with the preceding clause.) The verb πληθύνω is generally transitive in LXX., as in classical usage. But later writers confuse it with πληθύω, which is intrans. Cf. Acts vi. 1. In v. 10 infra, "multiplied offences" (πληθύνω) occurs in its usual sense. With the emotional and emphatic repetition, comp. vv. 12, 13 infra; Ps. lxxv. 1, lxxvii. 1, cxxiii. 3. For the thought, see Isa. lix. 12.

to behold and see the height of heaven.] The first verb—ἀτενίσαι—means "to gaze earnestly:" Luke iv. 20. Trommius refers to 3 Esdr. vi. 28 only. Aristotle has the term constructed with εἴς τι ('Meteor.' i. 6, 12) and πρός τι. "The height of heaven" (Ecclus. xvii. 32; Ps. ciii. 11) is mentioned as God's abode: Isa. xxxviii. 14 ("Mine eyes failed τοῦ βλέπειν εἰς τὸ ὕψος τοῦ οὐρανοῦ πρὸς τὸν κύριον"). Cf. also Luke xviii. 13; Susanna 9; Ps. cxxiii. 1; and the proper name Elioenai, "unto Jah are mine eyes."

for the multitude.] ἀπ' πλήθους. See Job xxxv. 9; ἀπὸ = מן, "from," i.e. owing to, because of. Gen. xxxvi. 7, מפני: see note on

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B.C. cir. 676. with many iron bands, that I cannot lift up mine head, ‖neither have any release: for I have provoked thy wrath, and done evil before thee: I did not thy will, neither kept I thy commandments: I have set up abominations, and have multiplied offences. Now therefore I bow the knee of mine heart, beseeching thee of grace. I have sinned, O Lord, I have sinned, B.C. cir. 676.

‖ Or, either like my wrath.

v. 4 supra. "Iniquities," ἀδικίαι, עונות (Jer. xi. 10); or the sing. עון (Jer. ii. 22; Hos. iv. 8).

I am bowed down with many iron bands.] Lit., "being bowed down with many an iron band, so that," &c. The words are wrongly divided from what precedes by the English punctuation. There should be a comma only after "iniquities." For σιδηρῷ (adj.), Cod. III. and 'Apost. Const.' have σιδήρου, "of iron." Cf. Dan. iv. 15, 23. According to the narrative in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, Manasseh was bound with a double chain of copper by his captors. Here he is represented as loaded with chains of iron, as a captive in a dungeon. But the sense is perhaps rather metaphorical, and refers to the chain of sin and misery: cf. Ps. cvii. 10, 14; Lam. i. 14; and the Ethiopic version: "I have laboured in fetters of iron, that I might get rest from sin for my soul: and by this also I have not gotten rest."

that I cannot lift up.] εἰς τὸ μὴ ἀνανεῦσαι. The word usually means "to throw the head back in token of denial," as we shake the head. Then sometimes "to throw the head up," whence ἀνανενευκὼς, "upright," "with the head erect;" Polyb. xviii. 13. 3; cf. bk. i. 23. 5; Lucian, 'Necyom.' 4. Old Lat. well: ut non possim attollere caput meum. Cf. Ps. xl. 12; cx. 7. The reading of Cod. III. is remarkable: εἰς τὸ ἀνανεῦσαί με ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτιῶν μου, "so that I throw back (my head) over my sins," as if "shake my head over them." But this reading probably rests on misapprehension.

neither have any release.] καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν μοι ἄνεσις, "and I have no remission or respite:" Old Lat. respiratio. Cf. 3 Esdr. iv. 62; Ecclus. xv. 20; 2 Cor. vii. 5. The next clauses are closely connected with this one, and a comma would be better than a colon after "release:" "Because I provoked thy wrath, and did that which was evil before thee (Ps. li. 4; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 2), by not doing (μὴ ποιήσας) thy will, and not keeping thy commandments, by setting up abominations, and multiplying objects of offence" (στήσας βδελύγματα κ. πληθύνας προσοχθίσματα). The words are an expansion of what is said of Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii. 6): ἐπλήθυνε τοῦ ποιῆσαι τὸ πονηρὸν ἐναντίον κυρίου τοῦ παροργίσαι αὐτόν. Cod. III. and the 'Apost. Const.' (Gk. and Ethiop.) omit μὴ ποιήσας . . . προστάγματά σου, and Tur. omits στήσας . . . προσοχθίσματα. Fritzsche pronounces against the former clause as needless and almost disturbing; and further, because it is also omitted in the Latin MSS., and because, if it were genuine, we should expect καὶ before στήσας. But καὶ before στήσας would destroy the symmetry of the two compound clauses; and both are suitable as defining Manasseh's provocation of God on the negative and positive side—his sins of omission and commission. Cf. Dan. ix. 5, 6, 11; and the General Confession, "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done," &c. For the second clause, the Ethiopic has: "While I observed vanities, and multiplied that which profited me not."

The phrase "done (the) evil before thee" refers especially to idolatry: see Deut. iv. 25; and the use of the phrase as a fixed formula in the annalistic epitome of Kings (2 Kings xvii. 17, &c.). Idols and idolatrous rites are called βδελύγματα, "abominations," תועבות (Deut. xxxii. 16; 2 Kings xvi. 3; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 2, and elsewhere often). Cf. Dan. ix. 27; Matt. xxiv. 15. Προσόχθισμα, offendiculum, שקוץ, is similarly used (2 Kings xxiii. 13; Ezek. vii. 20).

Now therefore.] "And now"—καὶ νῦν = ועתה; a common concluding formula in Heb. prayers (Dan. ix. 15, 17;—2 Chron. xx. 10; vi. 16, 17, 40, 41); and in other addresses (1 Chron. xxviii. 8, xxix. 13;—2 Chron. ii. 13, 15).

I bow the knee of mine heart.] The Greek κλίνω γόνυ καρδίας μου (Cod. III. omits μου) is peculiar. The usual phrase is κάμπτω ἐπὶ τὰ γόνατα (2 Kings i. 13). Κάμπτειν is intrans. (τὸν τράχηλον) in Ecclus. vii. 23. Κλίνειν τὸ οὖς is common. Manasseh means, of course, that his prayer is sincere; that his inward and outward postures correspond. Cf. "Rend your heart and not your garments" (Joel ii. 13). A similar metaphor is "the calves of our lips" (Hos. xiv. 2; cf. Ps. li. 17); and St. Paul's phrase "circumcision of the heart" (Rom. ii. 29).

beseeching thee of grace.] δεόμενος τῆς παρὰ σοῦ χρηστότητος, "craving, begging for the goodness that cometh from thee." "Goodness," v. 7 supra; טוב, Ps. xxv. 7; or טוּב, Ps. xxxi. 19. "Beseeching goodness from thee" would require gen. pers. et rei, or gen. pers. et accus. rei (Thucyd. i. 32). The Old Lat. precans a te bonitatem fails for want of a Latin article.

B.C. cir. 676. and I acknowledge mine iniquities: wherefore, I humbly beseech thee, forgive me, O Lord, forgive me, and destroy me not with mine iniquities. Be not angry with me for ever, by reserving evil for me; neither condemn me into the lower parts of the earth. For thou art the God, even the God of them that repent; and in me thou wilt shew all thy goodness: B.C. cir. 676

I acknowledge.] Fritzsche, ἐγὼ γινώσκω, from Codd. III. and T. The common reading is ἀναγινώσκω, agnosco (Hdt. ii. 91). In LXX. this verb generally means "to read" (קרא): Dan. v. 7, 8; 1 Macc. v. 14; Exod. xxiv. 7. See Ps. li. 3: "I acknowledge my transgressions," &c., τὴν ἀνομίαν μου ἐγὼ γινώσκω. Ethiop.: "my sin I confess."

wherefore, I humbly beseech thee.] Old Lat. quare. But the Gk. is ἀλλ' αἰτοῦμαι δεόμενος σου, "but I ask (שאל, Ps. xxi. 4, xxvii. 4), craving of thee." Cod. III. omits ἀλλ'.

forgive me.] ἄνες μοι (Ps. xxxix. 13). Cf. ἄνεσις supra. There is an ellipsis of τὰ ἁμαρτήματά μου: cf. Josh. xxiv. 19; Isa. i. 13. Old Lat. remitte mihi. The verb is joined with an accus. pers. (Gen. xviii. 24; Isa. ii. 9).

and (Cod. III. omits) destroy me not with mine iniquities.] Old Lat. ne simul perdas me cum, &c. Ethiopic: "deliver me not over to my sin." Schleussner is wrong in rendering ne prorsus perdas (συναπολέσῃς) ob (ταῖς) peccata mea, as Fritzsche observes. Cf. Gen. xviii. 23, xix. 15; Numb. xvi. 26; and especially Wisd. x. 3, Ecclus. viii. 15. What follows is more closely connected with this than the full stop in our version suggests: "neither, cherishing wrath (μηνίσας, 'Il.' i. 422, v. 178, &c.; poet. word) for ever, lay up the evils for me." [For μηνίω, see Ps. ciii. 9; Jer. iii. 12, "keep anger for ever." For τηρήσῃς (Cant. vii. 13) = צפן (Ps. xxxi. 19), "How great is thy goodness which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee." Old Lat. reserves mala mihi.] Cf. also Exod. xxxiv. 7. "The evils"—τὰ κακὰ—are the unknown evils which a guilty conscience dreads; or the article may be generic; or there may be a reference to penalties in the world to come. See next line.

neither condemn me into.] μηδὲ καταδικάσῃς με (Ps. xxxvii. 33; Dan. i. 10. The classical construction is τινός, the later τινὰ) ἐν τοῖς κατωτάτοις τῆς γῆς, "Neither sentence me in the lowest parts of the earth;" as if "mulct me in" (punish me with) the penalty of Hades; or, "treat me as one condemned in Hades." Vid. Deut. xxxii. 22; Ps. cxxxix. 15, lxxxvi. 13; Isa. xliv. 23; Ezek. xxvi. 20, for the conception of Hades as τὰ κατώτατα τῆς γῆς, the Underworld. See also Isa. xiv. 9, 14, 15; Ezek. xxxii. 18, 21 sqq.; Job x. 21, 22; xxvi. 5 sqq.: "The Rephaim (i.e. ghosts, spirits in Hades) tremble, whose dwelling is beneath the waters. Sheol (Hades) is naked before him, and Abaddon (the place of destruction) hath no covering" (Heb.). A vast subterranean and sub-oceanic cavern, void of light and utterly cheerless, peopled by feeble shadows of the departed, appears to have been the ancient Hebrew conception of Hades. This accords with the old Assyrian mythus of Ishtar's Descent into Hell ('Cuneif. Inscr. of West. Asia,' iv. 31), where it is called "the land of no return," "the region of darkness," "the house of darkness, the seat of (the god) Irkalla" (i.e. Plutus), "the house which they that enter go not forth (therefrom)," "the road whose course returneth not," "the house which they that enter long for light," "a place where much dust is their food, and their victual clay;" "the light they see not, in darkness they sit; they are clad also, like birds, with apparel of wings; on the door and the bar dust is spread." Similar, too, is the Homeric conception of the nether world, and the Norse notion of Hela's realm is not very different.

It is not quite clear whether Manasseh prays merely against death, like Hezekiah (Isa. xxxviii. 10, 11, 18), and the Psalmists (Ps. vi. 5; xxx. 9; lxxxviii. 10, 11; xxxix. 13); or whether he prays for deliverance from the penalties of the after-life. The Targums often speak of Gehinnom or Gehenna, i.e. hell in our sense, as "the house of woe and pain" reserved for the wicked; and the Book of Enoch describes two places of torment,—one, that of the fallen angels, under the mountains at the ends of the earth; the other, for human offenders, in the valley of Hinnom. But this belongs to the time of the Last Things; and we prefer the former, as the simpler and more natural view. Compare, however, the Ethiopic: "and remember not against me my evil for ever, and take not vengeance upon me in the depths of the earth."

For thou art the God.] Rather, "Because thou art God, (the) God of them that repent." The article is omitted before the second Θεὸς, as in Heb. אלהי הנחמים. This clause, too, should be taken with what precedes, as alleging the ground of those entreaties.

and in me thou wilt shew.] The result, "So—if thou hear my prayer—in me thou wilt shew," &c. (Exod. ix. 16). "My case is so heinous, that mercy to me would be a conspicuous revelation of Divine goodness;

B. C. cir. 676. for thou wilt save me, that am unworthy, according to thy great mercy. Therefore I will praise thee for ever all the days of my life: for all the powers of the heavens do praise thee, and thine is the glory for ever and ever. Amen. B. C. cir. 676.

because, though unworthy, thou wilt save me, according to thy great mercy." The wonder always is, not that God should love the good, but that He should save the guilty. Δείξῃς (Codd. III. and T.) joins on with the foregoing construction μηδὲ καταδικάσῃς.

goodness.] ἀγαθωσύνη, טובה (2 Chron. xxiv. 16; Rom. xv. 14). The next clause developes the result, as it respects Manasseh's own conduct. "And I will praise thee alway (διὰ παντὸς) in the days of my life (Codd. III. and T.) [vulgo, πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας, "all the days"]; for thee hymneth all the might of heaven, and thine is the glory for ever and ever (unto the ages). Amen." Comp. the close of Hezekiah's psalm (Isa. xxxviii. 19, 20).

thy great mercy.] τὸ πολὺ ἔλεός σου (Ecclus. xvi. 12). Elsewhere, τὸ μέγα ἔλ.

the powers of the heavens.] ἡ δύναμις τῶν οὐρανῶν means "the host of heaven" (so Ethiop.); i.e. the angels: Isa. xxxiv. 4; 2 Chron. xviii. 18; Matt. xxiv. 29. For the praise of the angels, see Ps. xxix. 1; lxxxix. 5; ciii. 20, 21.

ADDENDUM TO INTRODUCTION, p. 363 supra.

The Targum of Chronicles adds, after 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11: "And the Chaldeans made a copper mule, and pierced it all over with little holes, and shut him up therein, and kindled fire all around him. And when he was in straits, he besought help of all the idols which he had made, and was not helped, because they were worthless. And he turned, and prayed before the Lord his God, and humbled himself exceedingly before Jehovah, the God of his fathers; and he prayed before Him. Forthwith went all the angels, that are set over the entrances of the gates of prayer in heaven, and closed on his account all the entrances of the gates of prayer in heaven, and all the windows and lattices of heaven, that his prayer might not be received. And forthwith rolled round the pity of the Lord of the World, whose right hand is stretched out to receive the sinners that return to the fear of Him, and break the disposition of their heart by penitence. And He made a lattice, and an aperture in heaven, beneath His glorious throne, and heard his prayer, and received his petition. And He shook the world with His word, and the mule burst asunder, and he went forth therefrom. And the Spirit from between the wings of the Cherubim went forth and breathed upon him by decree of the Word of the Lord, and he returned unto his kingdom, unto Jerusalem. And Manasseh knew that the Lord He was God, Who had worked with him these signs and wonders; and he turned with all his heart before the Lord, and forsook all the idols, and served them not." (Targum of Chronicles, ed. M. F. Beck: August. Vindel. 1680; with corrections of the text from P. de Lagarde's 'Hagiographa Chaldaice,' Lipsiae, 1873.) Compare the fragmentary accounts at p. 363 supra; and the Introduction to the Song of the Three Children.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE FIRST BOOK

OF THE

MACCABEES.

INTRODUCTION.

	PAGE
§ I. Subject of the Book and its Divisions	373
§ II. Style and Diction	373
§ III. Authenticity of the Narrative	374
§ IV. Unity of the Work	376
§ V. Original Language and Author	376
§ VI. Date of Composition	378
§ VII. Sources of the Work	378
§ VIII. Religious Tone and Character	380

§ I. Subject of the Book and its Divisions.

THE First Book of Maccabees is an historical treatise, and professes to deliver to us the history of the Jews at a most critical time—the time of their revolt against the tyranny of the Syro-Macedonian kings, and re-establishment of their national independence. The events of the main narrative, which begins with the attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to crush the Jewish religion and terminates with the death of Simon the High Priest, cover a space of about forty years, extending from B.C. 175 to B.C. 135. This narrative commences in chap. i. 10, and proceeds uninterruptedly to the end of the treatise, with the single exception of a parenthesis in chap. viii. (vv. 1–16), which traces the gradual growth of the Roman power, and summarises the views entertained by the Jews of the Maccabean period on the constitution and character of the Roman State. This main narrative is preceded by an "Introduction" (chap. i. 1–9) on the subject of the establishment of the Macedonian power in Asia, whereby the Jews had fallen under the dominion of the Greeks. This "Introduction" covers a space of a hundred and forty-five years, from B.C. 331 to B.C. 176.

The main narrative of the Book divides itself into five portions:—1. An account of the proceedings of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the Hellenizing party which supported him, for the abolition of the Jewish religion and the desecration of the Temple (chap. i. 10–64). 2. The revolt of a certain number of Jews under Mattathias, and the commencement of the war of independence under his guidance and management (chap. ii. 1–79). 3. The conduct of the war by his son, Judas Maccabæus, from B.C. 166 to B.C. 161 (chaps. iii.—ix. 22). 4. The conduct of the war and of affairs generally by Jonathan, brother of Judas, from B.C. 161 to B.C. 143. And 5. The conduct of affairs by Simon, brother of Judas and Jonathan, from B.C. 143 to B.C. 135.

§ II. Style and Diction.

The style of the Book is varied. By far the greater part is written in a plain and simple narrative style, very similar to that of Judges, Samuel, and the two Books of Kings. There is the same brevity, the same lack of ornament, the same absence of what are commonly regarded as the graces of composition. But, on occasions, this style passes into a higher one. Under the influence of excited feeling the writer warms into eloquence, and expresses himself with rhetorical emphasis and amplification. Examples of this style are the following:—"Therefore there was great mourning in Israel, in every place where they were, so that the princes and elders mourned, the virgins and young men were made feeble, and the beauty of wisdom was changed. Every bridegroom took up lamentation, and she that sat in the marriage chamber was in heaviness. The land also was moved for the inhabitants thereof, and all the house of Jacob was covered with confusion" (chap. i. 25–29). "Thus they shed innocent blood on every side of the sanctuary, and defiled it; insomuch that the inhabitants of Jerusalem fled because of them; whereupon the city was made an habitation of strangers, and became strange to those that were born in her; and her own children left her. Her sanctuary was laid waste like a wilderness, her feasts were turned into mourning, her sabbaths into reproach, her honour into contempt. As had been her glory, so was her dishonour increased, and her excellency was turned into mourning" (chap. i. 37–40). "Upon this the host assembled themselves together, and went up into Mount Sion. And when they saw the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, and the gates burned up, and shrubs growing in the court as in a forest, or in one of the mountains, yea, and the priests' chambers pulled down, they rent their clothes, and made great lamentation, and cast ashes upon their heads, and fell down flat to the ground upon their faces, and blew an alarm with the trumpets, and cried toward heaven" (chap. iv. 37–40). Further instances will be found in chaps. vi. 39, ix. 10, xiv. 8–15. Finally, there are places where the style is not so much rhetorical as poetical, actual poems being worked into the narrative, which have all the excellences of the highest Hebrew art. Of these, the most remarkable is the "Lament of Mattathias," in chap. ii. 7–13;[1] but further specimens will be found in the dying utterance of Mattathias (chap. ii. 49–68), in the eulogium on Judas (chap. iii. 3–9), in his prayers (chaps. iii. 18–22; iv. 8–11, 30–33; vii. 41, 42), in the prayer of the Jews on the height over against Jerusalem (chap. iii. 50–53), and in the last words of Epiphanes (chap. vi. 10–13). It is remarkable that the poetic passages are contained, all of them, in the first seven chapters; and even of the highly rhetorical passages there is one only (chap. xiv. 8–15) which belongs to a later portion of the treatise. This will be seen to be a matter of some importance, when we come to consider the probable "sources" of the narrative.[1]

Digitized by Google

The work, as we have it, is written in Hellenistic Greek, like the Septuagint and the New Testament. It is, however, even more full than most Hellenistic Greek, of marked and sometimes harsh Hebraisms. This point will be further considered in a later section.[2] The peculiar words (ἅπαξ λεγόμενα) are not many in number. The following are all that have been noticed:—ἐξουδένωσις (chap. i. 39), φονοκτονία (ib. 24), δειλόομαι (iv. 8, 21, &c.), ἀσπιδίσκη (iv. 57), ὅμηρα for ὅμηροι (viii. 7, &c.), δειλόψυχος (viii. 15), ἐξουσιάζεσθαι (x. 70), ψογέω for ψέγω (xi. 5, 11), τελωνεῖσθαι (xiii. 39), ἀποσκορπίζω (xi. 55), ὁπλοδοτέω (xiv. 32), ἐπισυστρέφω (ib. 44), and ἀφαίρεμα (xv. 5). Besides these, a certain number of words are employed in new and strange senses, as διαστολή in chap. viii. 7, ἁδρύνω in chap. viii. 14, and παράστασις in chap. xv. 32.

§ III. Authenticity of the Narrative.

Serious attempts to impugn the authenticity of the history contained in the First Book of Maccabees were made in the last century. E. T. Wernsdorf in the year 1746, and his brother Gottfried in 1747, subjected the work to a rigid examination, and believed that they had discovered in it historical errors so numerous and important as to deprive it of all authority.[3] But the discussion which these attacks raised terminated in favour of the work impugned, and among modern critics of the literature of the period there

[1] See the comment on the passage, where an attempt has been made to give the rhythmic effect of the original.

[1] See below, § VII. [2] See § V.

[3] See E. H. Wernsdorf's 'De fontibus historiæ Syriæ,' Lipsiæ, 1746; and Gottf. Wernsdorf's 'Comment. hist. crit. de fide librorum Maccab., Vratisl., 1747.

Digitized by Microsoft®

is scarcely one who does not, expressly or by implication, allow the Book to be of the highest value, trustworthy in the main, and an authority for the history of the period second to no other. De Wette says of it, that it is "im Ganzen sehr glaubwürdig, genau chronologisch, und sich vor den andern historischen Erzeugnisser dieser Zeit vortheilhaft auszeichnend."[1] Ewald remarks: "The author was probably one of the first who embraced the whole compass of these thirty or forty years in a popular narrative, and his work still breathes the freshest inspiration of the peculiar elevation and glory of the time. In simple language it reproduces the clearest recollection of the full and many-sided truth of this great age, and its various development."[2] Both he and Dean Stanley base their narrative of the period mainly upon the statements of the writer of the Book, whose means of information they regard as good, and his honesty as unimpeachable.

The evidence of authenticity may be summed up under the two heads of external and internal evidence. The external evidence is somewhat scanty, owing to the fact that the remains of classical antiquity which bear upon the period and country are less copious than might have been desired. Still, the history recorded has many points of agreement with Polybius, Appian, Diodorus Siculus, and Porphyry (ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.'), and also some with the epitomes of Livy's later books, with Justin, and with Granius Licinianus; while it nowhere contradicts any statements of these writers, except where they are at variance one with another. It is, moreover, in complete harmony with the coins of the Syrian kings belonging to the period, and with the evidence—slight, no doubt, but not unimportant—furnished by the coins of Judæa.

Internal evidence of authenticity is furnished, first, by the general air of probability in the narrative, and especially by the entire absence from it of the miraculous element. Considering the circumstances of the time, the prevalent exaltation of spirit and strength of faith, it might have been expected that a similar tone would have pervaded the narrative to that which we find in the Second Book, where miraculous appearances are of frequent occurrence, and the continual active interposition of God in human affairs is a fundamental idea. In the First Book this idea finds no place, or at any rate no further place than is involved in the belief that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much" (James v. 16. Comp. 1 Macc. iv. 10–14, 30–34; vii. 41–43; xi. 71, 72). The successes of the Jews are the result of faith in God, and of earnest appeals to Him for protection and assistance, but are not accomplished by any visible supernatural agency. Secondly, the writer shews his candour and love of truth by an unsparing exposure of all the shortcomings of his own people—of their sinfulness, their half-heartedness, their defeats, their frequent despondency. On the other hand, he does not unduly disparage his people's adversaries. Having once designated Epiphanes as "a wicked root" (ῥίζα ἁμαρτωλός, chap. i. 10), he abstains from any further word of dispraise. He bestows no abusive epithet on any Syrian general, neither on Lysias, nor Bacchides, nor Nicanor, nor Cendebæus.[1] Again, there is a moderation in his estimates of numbers which is remarkable,[2] indicating, as it does, a clear intention of not overstepping the truth. Finally, there is a particularity and exactness in his geographical notices, such as belongs commonly to authentic narratives, while it rarely characterises those which are fictitious, mainly or wholly.

Still, though the work is to be regarded as, in the main, a thoroughly credible

[1] 'Einleitung in das Alt. Test.,' § 299, p. 398.
[2] 'History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 465, E. T.

[1] Contrast the practice of the writer of the Second Book (ch. v. 24; vii. 29, 34, &c.; viii. 32, 34; ix. 28; xii. 35; xv. 3, 32).

[2] The largest Syrian force mentioned in 1 Macc. consists of 120,000 foot and 8,000 horse (ch. xv. 13)—not an extravagant estimate, considering that Antiochus the Great had 170,000 men at Magnesia (App. 'Syriaca,' § 32). The greatest number of Syrians slain in any one battle is 5,000 (ch. iv. 34; vii. 32); the entire number of Syrians slain, 26,800. The author of the Second Book, on the other hand, makes the slain twice 20,000, twice a little over 20,000, twice 25,000, once 30,000, and once 35,000 (ch. xv. 27); while his total of slain mounts up to 221,100!

Digitized by Microsoft®

history, it must be confessed that it contains a considerable number of mistakes. These belong especially to the portions of the history which treat of foreign nations, and of times somewhat remote from the writer's own day. In his sketch of the rise and progress of the Macedonian power, the writer wrongly states, 1. That Alexander the Great "slew the kings of the earth" (chap. i. 2); 2. That on his death-bed he made a partition of his kingdom among his friends (ib. 6); and 3. That these friends "all put crowns upon their heads" (ib. 9). His longer and more elaborate account of the growth and character of the Roman Republic contains the following errors:—1. That the Romans had, in B.C. 161, "brought the Galatians under tribute" (chap. viii. 2); 2. That, by the same time, they had conquered the whole of Spain (ib. 4); 3. That the elephants brought into the field by Antiochus the Great at the battle of Magnesia amounted to 120, whereas the real number was 54 (ib. 6); 4. That Antiochus was taken prisoner in the engagement (ib. 7); 5. That India formed a portion of his dominions at the time (ib. 8); 6. That India and Media were ceded by Antiochus to Rome and made over by Rome to Eumenes (ib.); 7. That the Greeks aimed at invading Italy and destroying Rome (ib. 9); 8. That the Romans had conquered Greece before B.C. 161 (ib. 10); 9. That the number of the Roman Senate was 320 (ib. 15); 10. That the Senate sat daily (ib.); 11. That the Romans were governed by a single annual magistrate (ib. 16); and 12. That "there was neither envy nor emulation among them" (ib.). The number and character of these errors detract seriously from the authority of the writer as a general historian, but leave his credibility in respect of his own nation and times untouched. He may not indeed be always absolutely correct on these subjects; but his testimony is not to be set aside without very strong counter-evidence.

§ IV. Unity of the Work.

The unity of the work has not, so far as we are aware, been called in question. The unity of its plan is evident; and though a greater elevation of style characterises the portion anterior to the death of Judas[1] (chaps. i.–ix. 18), yet the difference is not very marked, and there is one passage in a later chapter (chap. xiv. 4–15) where the author takes almost as high a flight as in any section of the earlier narrative. The diction is throughout uniform; and there are one or two peculiarities of the writer which may be traced through the whole Book from first to last. The most striking of these is his reticence with respect to the Holy Name, which occurs, according to the best manuscripts, once only in the entire history (chap. iv. 24). The usual mode of avoidance is a substitution of the word "Heaven" for "God" or "Lord,"[2] while sometimes there is a mere awkward omission, which our translators have thought it necessary to supply.[3] Another peculiarity is exactness with respect to dates; and this is a feature equally conspicuous throughout.[4]

§ V. Original Language and Author.

That the First Book of Maccabees abounds in Hebraisms of a marked and somewhat harsh character is generally admitted. Such phrases as "recovering the Law out of the hand of the Gentiles" (chap. ii. 48), "walking according to a man's sayings" (chap. vi. 23), "finding favour in men's sight" (x. 60), "the book of the days of his priesthood" (chap. xvi. 24), are unmistakable, and betray a familiarity with Semitic turns of expression which sufficiently indicates the ethnic type whereto the writer belonged. But it has been questioned whether this would by itself prove that the original work was written in Hebrew, since "the Hebraisms which exist are," it is said, "such as might have been naturalised in the Hebrew-Greek of Palestine."[5] The writer

[1] See above, § II.

[2] See ch. iii. 50, 60; iv. 10, 40; ix. 46; xvi. 3.

[3] As in ch. i. 62; ii. 21, 26; iii. 22, 53, 60; iv. 10, 55; xvi. 3. In ch. iii. 18, vii. 27, and vii. 41, the MSS. have two readings, one suppressing, the other expressing, the Holy Name.

[4] See ch. i. 54; ii. 70; iii. 37; iv. 52; vi. 16, 20; vii. 1, 49; ix. 3, 54; x. 1, 57, 67; xi. 19; xiii. 41, 51; xiv. 1, 27; xv. 10; xvi. 14.

[5] Smith, 'Dictionary of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 172.

Digitized by Microsoft®

might have been a Semite, a native of Palestine, a Jew, and yet have written in Greek, as did James and John, Peter, Mark, and Jude. If this had been the case, his Greek would no doubt have been deeply tinged with a Hebraistic character. Is it more deeply tinged than would be accounted for by this hypothesis? It is difficult to give a decided answer to this question; but our own impression is that, even apart from any external testimony, sound criticism would have pronounced the work a translation from a Semitic original.[1]

The matter, however, is one which we need not call in the aid of criticism to determine. The positive testimony of antiquity is such as to leave no doubt on the subject. Origen informs us that the title under which the work was known in his day was 'Sarbeth Sarbaneel,' which is a Hebrew and not a Greek description of its contents,[1] while Jerome states that he was acquainted with a Hebrew text which he evidently regarded as the original.[2] As Origen and Jerome are at once the most critical of the Fathers, and the best acquainted with the Hebrew language and literature, their testimony must be looked upon as entirely decisive of the point here under discussion.

Concerning the author, tradition is wholly silent. The internal evidence shews him to have been a Palestinian Jew, an earnest patriot, and a devout member of the orthodox party. He is deeply impressed with the heroism of the national leaders, and bent on glorifying them, yet not to the extent of concealing their errors or reverses. There is no appearance of his having actually taken part in the events which he relates; but his sympathy with those who were at the head of affairs is so keen that it is difficult to suppose him unacquainted with them. He is a man, however, of the pen rather than of the sword, and probably belonged to the literary class which sprang into being under the stimulating

[1] It is impossible fully to exhibit the evidence on which our impression rests, but the following list of Hebraisms in the first half of the first chapter may be taken as a sample of it:—

Ch. i. 1. Καὶ ἐγένετο, as an opening phrase, corresponds to the Heb. וַיְהִי (Judg. i. 1; Ruth i. 1; Nehem. i. 1; Esth. i. 1, &c.). Πατάξαι for "to defeat" corresponds to the Hebrew use of הכה. ἡ γὴ Χεττειελμ literally renders the Heb. אֶרֶץ כִּתִּים.

Ch. i. 3. Ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ literally renders על פני. Ἐπήρθη ἡ καρδία literally renders וַיָּרָם לֵב.

Ch. i. 4. Ἐγένοντο εἰς φόρον literally renders וַיִּהְיוּ לָמַס (Gen. xlix. 15).

Ch. i. 10. Καὶ ἐπλήθυναν ἐν τῇ γῇ literally renders וַיִּרְבּוּ בָּאָרֶץ.

Ch. i. 11. Ῥίζα (of a man) literally renders שֹׁרֶשׁ.

Ch. i. 12. Διαθέσθαι διαθήκην literally renders כָּרַת בְּרִית. Κύκλῳ (ἡμῶν) literally renders סָבִיב.

Ch. i. 13. Καὶ ἠγαθύνθη ὁ λόγος ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς literally renders וַיִּיטַב הַדָּבָר בְּעֵינֵי.

Ch. i. 16. Καὶ ἐπράθησαν τοῦ ποιῆσαι τὸ πονηρόν literally renders וַיִּתְמַכְּרוּ לַעֲשׂוֹת הָרַע (2 Kings xvii. 17).

Ch. i. 17. Καὶ ἡτοιμάσθη ἡ βασιλεία literally renders וַתִּכֹּן הַמַּמְלָכָה.

Ch. i. 18. Ἐν ὄχλῳ βαρεῖ literally renders בְּחַיִל כָּבֵד.

Ch. i. 19. Καὶ ἔπεσον τραυματίαι πολλοί literally renders וַיִּפְּלוּ חֲלָלִים רַבִּים. Ἀπὸ προσώπου αὐτοῦ literally renders מִפָּנָיו.

Ch. i. 23. Τὴν τράπεζαν τῆς προθέσεως literally renders שֻׁלְחַן הַמַּעֲרֶכֶת.

Ch. i. 24. Τὰ σκεύη τὰ ἐπιθυμητά literally renders כְּלֵי חֶמְדָּה.

Ch. i. 29. Καὶ ἐσείσθη ἡ γῆ ἐπὶ τοὺς κατοικοῦντας αὐτήν literally renders וַתִּרְעַשׁ הָאָרֶץ עַל־יֹשְׁבֶיהָ.

Ἐνεδύσατο αἰσχύνην literally renders לָבַשׁ בּוּשֶׁת.

Ch. i. 30. Μετὰ δύο ἔτη ἡμερῶν literally renders מִקֵּץ שְׁנָתַיִם יָמִים. Ἄρχοντα φορολογίας literally renders שַׂר מַס.

Ch. i. 31. Καὶ ἐλάλησε λόγους εἰρηνικούς literally renders וַיֹּאמֶר דִּבְרֵי שָׁלוֹם.

Ch. i. 32. Ἐπάταξε πληγὴν μεγάλην literally renders הִכָּה מַכָּה גְּדוֹלָה.

Ch. i. 33. Καὶ ἐνεπύρισε πυρὶ αὐτήν literally renders וַיִּשְׂרְפֶהָ בָּאֵשׁ.

Ch. i. 38. Εἰς διάβολον πονηρόν literally renders לְשָׂטָן רַע.

[1] Sarbeth sarbane-el is thought to be put for שַׂרְבֵת שָׂרֵי בְנֵי אֵל, "History of the princes of the Sons of God" (De Wette, Grimm); but is, in any case, a Semitic, and not a Greek title.

[2] Prolog. Galeat.

Digitized by Microsoft®

influence of the great national movement and development of the Maccabean times.

§ VI. Date of Composition.

The statement in chap. xiii. 30, that the splendid monument which Simon erected to the memory of his father and brothers was still standing in the writer's day, at once removes him by a not inconsiderable interval from the period of Simon's accession, B.C. 143. It does not, however, remove him from it by such an interval as the ordinary reader might suppose, since the disturbed state of Palestine must be taken into account, and the likelihood that some of the enemies of the Asmonæan dynasty might have destroyed any monument of their glory before it had stood very long. Grimm's estimate[1] of "thirty years" as the shortest period that can be supposed to be intended is a tolerably fair one; and we might therefore conclude from this passage alone that the Book before us was probably not written earlier than about B.C. 113.

It has been generally concluded from the closing words of the Book (ch. xvi. 23, 24), that a still later date must be assigned to it. The writer, it is said, speaks of the reign of John Hyrcanus as if it were over, thereby implying that he outlived him, and wrote after his death.[2] Now John Hyrcanus died in B.C. 106. It is impossible, however, to prove from the words of the writer in the passage adduced, that John Hyrcanus was not still living when he penned them. He merely says that his deeds, from the time that he became high-priest, were written in the high-priestly chronicles. He says nothing of his death or burial. No doubt his words are modelled upon those with which the writers of Kings and Chronicles wind up their account of each monarch upon his demise; but they differ in containing no mention of a funeral or of a successor. Those critics seem to have reason on their side who have concluded that the First Book of Maccabees may have been written in the time of John Hyrcanus, but at an advanced period of his reign[1] (say B.C. 116–106).

We thus obtain the earliest probable date for the composition. The latest probable date is more difficult to determine. The grounds of argument are here, comparatively speaking, intangible and matters of opinion. The consideration of style is thought to indicate a date at least a century earlier than any portion of the New Testament. The simple faith which runs through the account given of Roman disinterestedness (chap. viii. 12–16) could not possibly have outlived the proceedings of Pompey, when in B.C. 63 he took Jerusalem, and is likely to have come to an end much earlier. The jubilant and triumphant tone of the narrative is unsuitable to any time later than the close of the reign of John Hyrcanus, since troubles then set in, which continued, at any rate, till the accession of Herod the Great. The life and spirit of the narrative, and the minuteness of the geographical and local details, are also in favour of a comparatively early composition. Altogether B.C. 105—the year after the death of Hyrcanus—seems to be the latest date that is at all probable, though a date later than this by thirty or forty years cannot be said to be altogether impossible.[2]

§ VII. Sources of the Work.

The writer clearly possesses a number of state-documents, which he regards as authentic, and inserts, either in full or else in an abbreviated form, in his narrative. Such are: 1. The letter of the Romans to the Jewish people (chap. viii. 23–32), sent by Eupolemus and Jason,

[1] 'Der Erste Buch der Maccabäer erklärt,' Einleitung, § 7, p. xxiv.

[2] De Wette, 'Einleitung in das Alt. Test.,' § 300; Grimm, 'Einleitung,' l. s. c.; Ewald, 'History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 463, E. T.

[1] Hengstenberg, 'Authentie des Daniel,' p. 293; Bertheau, 'De Secundo Maccabæorum libro,' p. 27; Westcott in Dr. W. Smith's 'Dictionary of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 173.

[2] See the arguments of Grimm, in his 'Introduction,' § 7, p. xxv., who assigns for the date the interval between B.C. 105 and B.C. 64; and compare, on the other side, Ewald (l. s. c.), who suggests B.C. 105 definitely, and Westcott in Smith's 'Dictionary,' who places the composition between B.C. 120 and B.C. 100.

Digitized by Microsoft®

the ambassadors dispatched to Rome by Judas Maccabæus; 2. The letter of Alexander Balas to Jonathan (chap. x.18–20), granting him the office of High Priest; 3. The letter of Demetrius I. to the Jewish people, offering terms of peace and alliance (chap. x. 25–45); 4. The letter of Demetrius II. to Jonathan, which was to be "set in a conspicuous place" (chap. xi. 30–37); 5. The letter of Jonathan to the Lacedæmonians, proposing a renewal of friendship and brotherhood (ch. xii. 6–18); 6. The previous letter of Areus, king of Sparta, to Onias I., the High Priest (ch. xii. 20–23); 7. The letter of Demetrius II. to Simon the High Priest, renewing friendship and granting privileges (chap. xiii. 36–40); 8. The letter of the Lacedæmonians to Simon renewing friendship (ch. xiv. 20–23); 9. The decree of the Jewish people establishing the high priesthood in Simon's family and conferring various privileges upon him (chap. xiv. 27–45); 10. The letter of Antiochus Sidetes to Simon proposing alliance and extending Simon's privileges (chap. xv. 3–9); and 11. The circular letter of the Romans, addressed to states and kingdoms under their influence, on behalf of the Jews (ch. xv. 16–21). These documents have a general air of authenticity about them; but it has to be borne in mind that they are, at the best, translations of translations, having been written originally either in Latin or Greek, then translated by the author of the Book into the later Hebrew, and from this again rendered into Greek by the Greek translator of the Book, who is not likely to have had access to the original documents.

It has sometimes been supposed that, besides these written authorities — authorities of great value, but scattered and discontinuous—our author may have had access to a set of state papers, which contained something like an unbroken history of his nation from the time of the completion of the Second Temple, B.C. 516. Ewald supposes that "the high-priestly journals were kept up continually after the foundation of the new temple," and that "after the Asmonæans became high-priests and national princes, they were elevated to the rank of the previous annals of the kingdom."[1] He even quotes 1 Macc. xvi. 23, 24 as favouring this view.[2] But though that passage distinctly proves the keeping of such journals from the accession of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135), it furnishes an argument against, rather than for, their composition during the preceding period. For it is difficult to conceive of any reason having determined the writer of the Book on concluding his own narrative with the accession of John, other than the fact that he considered the existence of the high-priestly chronicles from that date to render the continuance of his history unnecessary.[3] In fact, the troubles of the time were so great from the beginning of the oppression of Epiphanes, B.C. 170, to the accession of Simon, B.C. 143, that we can scarcely imagine any records kept, so that the question seems to narrow itself to this: Did or did not Simon leave an official record of his high-priesthood? The answer would seem to be, that, however probable it may appear that he would have done so, there is no evidence that he did. In any case, the high-priestly journals must have failed our author for the greater portion of the time whereof he treats, and it becomes necessary to consider whether we cannot trace his main narrative, certainly or probably, to a different source.

It has been suggested that he took his account of the origin of the insurrection and of the exploits of Judas from an earlier literary work treating expressly of that period.[4] His own words in chap. ix. 22 have been supposed to imply that such a work existed; and the peculiarly poetical character of the portion of the Book dealing with the history of Judas has been thought to be best accounted

[1] 'History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 462, E. T.

[2] See note [2] ad loc.

[3] See the remarks of Grimm ('Einleitung,' § 6, p. xxiii.), "Da der Berichterstatter unter Verweisung auf Johan. Hyrcan's Jahrbücher den Faden der Erzählung gerade da fallen lässt, wo ihn diese Jahrbücher aufnehmen, so scheinen über die Thaten und Schicksale der drei Vorgänger Hyrcan's keine derartigen Jahrbücher vorhanden gewesen zu seyn, indem in solchem Falle der Verfasser sein Unternehmen für überflüssig erachtet haben würde."

[4] Smith, 'Dictionary of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 171.

for by the view that he there transcribed from a work cast in a poetic mould. But this argument, though ingenious, is weak. It is certainly not said in ch. ix. 22, that any written account existed of the exploits of Judas except that of our author; and the difference of tone between the earlier and later chapters of his treatise is sufficiently explained by the superior grandeur and pathos of the events related in the former. The most heroic deeds contained in his history were those of Mattathias and Judas; the latter phases of the war were, comparatively, commonplace. Thus the style merely varies with the subject-matter.

If then the writer is not to be viewed as having derived the general facts of his history either from a chronicle kept by the High Priests and deposited in the archives of the kingdom, or from any work of an earlier historian, what other source is there which can be regarded as open to him? The answer to this question is twofold. In the first place, it is quite possible that he may have written largely from his own recollections. If he wrote, as Ewald supposes, in B.C. 105, and was seventy years old at the time, which cannot be regarded as improbable, his boyhood would have synchronised with the time of Mattathias and Judas, his early manhood with that of Jonathan, and his middle age with the pontificate of Simon, so that the bulk of his history would be an account of the events of his own day. If, on the other hand, he was a comparatively young man when he wrote, he would have had to obtain his facts from those among his elder contemporaries who had witnessed and shared in the transactions. As there are now (1887) living many Waterloo heroes, so in B.C. 105 there would have existed in the Jewish community persons who had seen the "abomination of desolation" on the altar of burnt sacrifice, who had fled into the wilderness with Mattathias, and fought in the early battles of Judas. In default of personal experience the writer would naturally have recourse to these veterans, and would receive at their mouth the graphic descriptions, so minute, so exact, so full of geographical detail, which charm us in his narrative. On the whole, it may be said that the work is most probably based in part upon the writer's personal knowledge of the facts which he records, more largely upon inquiries which he had made of persons present at events which he did not himself witness, and partly also, but to a comparatively small extent, on documents laid up in the Jewish archives or inscribed on bronze tablets and set up in some public place in Jerusalem (chap. xi. 37; xiv. 18, 27).

§ VIII. Religious Tone and Character.

The strong religious feeling of the writer, his deep regard for the Law, the Temple, and the Temple worship, his horror at the profanities of Epiphanes and the blasphemies of Nicanor, and his earnest belief in a superintending Providence, are very apparent. But he is careful not to obtrude the religious element into his narrative unnecessarily. His nature is particularly reverent and reticent. He declines, as a general rule, to introduce into his treatise the Holy Names of "God" and "Lord," whereby the Supreme Being was commonly designated.[1] He does not even expressly refer the triumphant successes of the Maccabean princes to the Divine protection and assistance. It would not, perhaps, be remarkable that he mentions no miraculous occurrence as taking place during the war, but for the fact that the authors of the Second and Third Books relate so many. It is clear that he himself believed the successes of the Asmonæans to have been achieved, without miraculous interference, by the ordinary action of those causes and laws which govern the world. Among these causes, however, he assigned an important place to the action of God upon men's minds, whereby courage is infused or a panic fear produced, so that "the victory of battle standeth not in the multitude of an host" (chap. iii. 19), but "many are shut up into the hands of a few" (ib. 18).

The principle of reticence on sacred subjects may also have caused the absence from his writings of any clear notice of the Messianic hopes which prevailed in his day, and which appear from the 'Psalms of Solomon' and the 'Book of Enoch,' works of the same age, to have been raised to a high pitch by the successes of the Maccabean princes in their struggle after independence. He has indeed, in one place, a regretful reference to the suspension of prophecy in the past (chap. ix. 27), and twice he "anticipates the future coming of a Prophet as of one who should make a direct revelation of the will of God (chap. iv. 46), and supersede the temporary arrangements of a merely civil dynasty (chap. xiv. 41)."[1] But the Messianic idea occupies no prominent place in his Book, which is narrative, not didactic; and which, so far as it teaches at all, teaches by example, not by inculcation of belief or even definite statements of doctrine.

[1] See above, § IV., sub fin.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[1] Westcott in the 'Dictionary of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 174.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE FIRST BOOK

OF THE MACCABEES.

CHAPTER I.

14 Antiochus gave leave to set up the fashions of the Gentiles in Jerusalem, 22 and spoiled it, and the temple in it, 57 and set up therein the abomination of desolation, 63 and slew those that did circumcise their children.

AND it happened, after that Alexander son of Philip, the Macedonian, who came out of the land of ‖Chettiim, had smitten Darius king of the Persians and Medes, that B. C. cir. 331.

‖ Or, Chethiim.

CHAPTER I.

§ 1. Preliminary Historical Sketch.

1–9. The author introduces his narrative by a brief summary of the events which had placed the Jews under Greek rule—to wit, the conquests of Alexander the Great, and the continued power of his successors. These events covered a space of a hundred and fifty-six years (B.C. 331–175), counting from the battle of Arbela. It is remarkable that he makes no mention of the circumstances, that, in the original division of Alexander's empire, Judæa fell to Ptolemy, king of Egypt; and that its transfer to Syria did not take place till B.C. 203, when it voluntarily placed itself under the Seleucidæ.

1. And it happened.] The Greek words, καὶ ἐγένετο, are a translation of the Hebrew vayĕhi, so frequently used by the Old Testament writers at the commencement of their narratives (Josh. i. 1; Judg. i. 1; Ruth i. 1; 1 Sam. i. 1; Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 1; Jonah i. 1). The original intention of the phrase was to connect the narrative which it introduced with some previous history; but at the time at which this book was written it had lost this special force, and was a mere archaism. It would be best translated in this place "Now it happened."

Alexander son of Philip.] Alexander the Great is thus distinguished from the Seleucid Alexanders (Balas and Zabinas), with whom the author and his readers would be familiar. They were known respectively as the sons of Antiochus Epiphanes and Alexander Balas.

the Macedonian.] The epithet belongs to Alexander, not to Philip. It further distinguishes him from other Alexanders.

the land of Chettiim.] Chettiim, or Chittim (Num. xxiv. 24; Dan. xi. 30), seems primarily to have designated Cyprus (Joseph. 'A. J.,' i. 6, § 1), whose chief town in the more ancient times was Cition; but a later usage extended the term to the islands off the coast of Asia Minor generally, and even to the European coast that lay beyond them. Here "the land of Chettiim" can only be Greece or Macedon. Grimm well compares the loose employment of the word "Frank" by Turks and Arabs.

smitten.] I.e. "defeated." The writer uses the verb παταάσσω in this sense constantly (see ch. iii. 11; iv. 2; v. 7, &c.). It is a Hebraism, common in the Septuagint (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 33, vii. 2; Josh. viii. 22, 24, &c.).

Darius king of the Persians.] This is Darius III., or Darius Codomannus, the same king whose name occurs in Nehem. xii. 22. Alexander defeated Darius III. twice—at Issus in B.C. 333, and two years later at Arbela, in the ancient Assyria. As it was this last victory which gave him the empire of the East, it is no doubt the one here intended.

and Medes.] It is curious to find "the Medes" still obtaining such honourable mention. No doubt they were always regarded as the chief of the subject nations; but it is in the earlier times of the Persian empire that their rank is most apparent. In Daniel Media even has precedence over Persia (Dan. v. 28; vi. 8, 12, 15). In Esther the position is reversed (Esth. i. 3, 14, 18, 19), except in one place (ch. x. 2). In Ezra and Nehemiah the Medes drop wholly out of sight. It would seem, however, that their honourable position was, in point of fact, maintained until the close of the Empire (Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.,' iv. 7, § 2; xii. 4, § 11).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 331. he reigned in his stead, the first over Greece,

2 And made many wars, and won many strong holds, and slew the kings of the earth,

3 And went through to the ends of the earth, and took spoils of many nations, insomuch that the earth was quiet before him; whereupon ‖ he was exalted, and his heart was lifted up. B. C. cir. 325.

‖ Or, his heart was exalted and lifted up.

he reigned in his stead, the first over Greece.] There is probably some corruption here, or some mistranslation of the Hebrew original. The Syriac version has—"he reigned in his stead, but previously he had reigned over Greece," and this may give us a clue to the real intention of the writer. It is absurd to suppose, with Eichhorn and Hengstenberg, that he was so ignorant of history as to imagine that Darius Codomannus had been King of Greece.

2. And made many wars.] Some of these were in Europe, before he crossed into Asia, as those with the Triballi and Getæ, and with the Illyrians. The remainder were in Asia, and included his war with Darius and his conquests, after Darius's death, in Bactria, Sogdiana, Arachosia, and India. Alexander's career of victory covered the space between B.C. 335 and B.C. 324.

and won many strong holds.] As Thebes, in B.C. 335; Miletus, Halicarnassus, and Celænæ, in B.C. 334; Tyre and Gaza, in B.C. 332; Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, in B.C. 331; Ecbatana and Rhagæ in B.C. 330; Bactra and Maracanda, in B.C. 329; Choriene and the rock of Aornus, in B.C. 327. Alexander made it a point of honour to take every stronghold which refused to submit to him (Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.' iii. 30; iv. 17, 18, 22, &c.).

and slew the kings of the earth.] This is scarcely a correct statement, since Alexander's clemency was remarkable. Probably the writer was not intimately acquainted with the great conqueror's history, and moreover expressed himself rhetorically, meaning simply that he prevailed over all his adversaries. It is quite inadmissible to regard him as alluding, in such a connection as the present, to the murder of Clitus, or the execution of suspected officers.

3. And went through to the ends of the earth.] Samarcand, the Sutlej, and the Indian Ocean were "ends of the earth" to all but a select few in the first and second centuries B.C. Alexander's soldiers had themselves complained, by the mouth of Cœnus, that he had led them to the extreme limit of the habitable world ("Pæne in ultimo mundi fine consistimus." Q. Curt. 'Hist. Al.' ix. 3).

and took spoils.] The booty which Alexander acquired in the course of his conquests was, according to all accounts, immense. At Issus the Persian camp was found full of gold and silver plate, the royal tent exceeding all others in magnificence. A large treasure was captured, soon after the battle, at Damascus (Arr. 'Exp. Alex.' ii. 11, § 13; Parmen. ap. Athen. 'Deipn.' xiii. p. 607). Another considerable gain was made at Arbela, after the great fight (Q. Curt. 'Hist. Al.' v. 1). But all these were small matters compared with the enormous captures made at Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis. The spoils of Babylon enabled the victor to give to every man in his army sums varying from six pounds sterling to eighteen; at Susa the treasury contained 50,000 talents, or above 12,000,000*l.* of our money; while at Persepolis the value of the precious metals captured is reckoned at above 27,000,000*l.* (See Grote, 'History of Greece,' vol. viii. p. 394.) When Alexander reached Ecbatana, he deposited there the almost incredible sum of 180,000 talents, or above 43,000,000*l.* (Ibid. p. 400.)

insomuch that the earth was quiet before him.] Literally, "And the earth was quiet before him." No one, i.e., ventured to oppose him (compare ch. xi. 38)—his will was law to all.

he was exalted.] Rather, as in the margin, "his heart was exalted." (Compare Hosea xiii. 6.) The effect produced on Alexander by the intoxication of success is abundantly noted by profane historians. "Here," says Curtius (i.e. in Parthia), "he openly gave the rein to his desires, and exchanged restraint and moderation, the highest excellences of exalted fortune, for pride and licence. He laid aside the customs of his ancestors, as unsuited to his own greatness, and, adopting those of the Persian court, aspired to equal the lofty grandeur of the gods. He began to allow himself to be worshipped by prostrate crowds, and aimed at making his victorious companions in arms as base and servile as their vanquished foes. He assumed the diadem of purple spotted with white which Darius had worn, and took the Persian habit, regardless of the evil omen involved in replacing the ensigns of conquest by those of defeat. He boasted that thus he bore the spoils of Asia on his person; but in reality with the spoils he donned Asiatic manners, and added to pride of array an insolent and overbearing spirit" (Q. Curt. 'Hist. Al.' vi. 6, § 1; compare Arrian, 'Exp. Al.' iv. 8, § 7).

B. C. cir. 323.

4 And he gathered a mighty strong host, and ruled over countries, and nations, and ‖ kings, who became tributaries unto him.

5 And after these things he fell sick, and perceived ‖ that he should die.

6 Wherefore he called his servants, such as were honourable, and had been brought up with him from his youth, and parted his kingdom among them, while he was yet alive.

7 So Alexander reigned twelve years, and then died.

8 And his servants bare rule every one in his place.

‖ Or, kingdoms which became, &c.

‖ Gr. that he dieth.

B. C. cir. 323.

4. he gathered a mighty strong host.] The army with which Alexander invaded Asia amounted to no more than 30,000 foot and 4,500 horse (Grote, 'Hist. of Greece,' vol. viii. p. 305); but the reinforcements which he received from time to time were large, and at Arbela his troops did not fall far short of 50,000 (Arr. 'Exp. Al.' iii. 12). It is not probable that he ever collected together a much larger force than this. The "strength" of his army was in its quality rather than its numbers.

and ruled over . . . kings.] The marginal "kingdoms" is certainly wrong. By τύραννοι the writer probably means "satraps," or "rulers of provinces." Compare Esther ix. 3, where akhashdarpĕnim, "satraps," is rendered by τύραννοι. Alexander for the most part kept up the Persian satrapial system. In some places, however, he allowed petty kings to retain their titles (Arrian, ii. 13, 20; iii. 2, &c.; Justin, xi. 10).

who became tributaries unto him.] It was among the main duties of the satraps under the Persian governmental system to collect the tribute of the several provinces and remit it to the Court. Hence had arisen the immense accumulations already mentioned. (See the comment on v. 3.) It was Alexander's intention to continue the same system (Grote, 'Hist. of Greece,' vol. viii. p. 469); but he had scarcely time to establish it fully before his premature death.

5. he fell sick.] Literally, "he fell upon his bed," or, as we say, "took to his bed." (Compare Judith viii. 3, where nearly the same expression is used.) Alexander's illness lasted nine days (Arrian, vii. 25, 26; Plut. 'Vit. Alex.' § 76); but it was only for the last two days that he remained in bed without rising.

and perceived that he should die.] Alexander seems scarcely to have realised the fact that he was dying until very shortly before he became speechless. Had he done so, he would probably have taken more decided steps with regard to the succession than he did.

6. he called his servants.] By "his servants" the writer means "his courtiers." Compare 1 Kings xi. 26, xvi. 9; 2 Kings xxi. 23; Matt. xiv. 2, &c.

such as were honourable.] Or "such as were held in repute."

brought up with him from his youth.] The "Companions," as they were called—reduced by the deaths of Hephæstion, Parmenio, Philotas, and Clitus to some nine or ten—were Antigonus, Cassander, Craterus, Leonnatus, Lysimachus, Meleager, Menander, Perdiccas, Pithon, and Seleucus. The Macedonian system placed the young nobles on a near equality with the heir-apparent.

parted his kingdom among them, while he was yet alive.] Here the author reports an incorrect tradition, or follows an untrustworthy authority. Few facts of history are more certain than that the great Macedonian made no disposition of his dominions before his decease. In his last hours the problem which suggested itself to him was, who should be his successor. He never conceived the idea of dividing his empire. It was to go "to him who was worthiest," according to his last words; to Perdiccas, according to his last act, the transfer to that general of his signet-ring. When, however, political exigencies had produced the partition of his dominions, the rumour soon spread that this had been done by Alexander's desire. The general report was, that he had made the division by will (Q. Curt. 'Hist. Al.' x. 10, § 5; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6; Mos. Chor. 'Hist. Arm.' ii. 1; Joh. Mal. 'Chronograph.' viii. p. 195; Diod. Sic., xx. 81). It would seem, however, from the present passage, that there was another version of the story also current, by which the distribution made after his demise was said to be in accordance with instructions given by him upon his death-bed. Both reports may be traced to the desire of legitimating what had been done by referring it to the express commandment, spoken or written, of the half-deified king.

7. Alexander reigned twelve years.] From July, B.C. 336, to May, B.C. 323 (Clinton, 'F. H.,' vol. ii. pp. 281–284), or twelve years and ten months, seemingly. Diodorus says (xvii. 117), twelve years and seven months; Arrian (vii. 28), twelve years and eight months.

8. his servants bare rule every one in his

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 323. 9 And after his death they all put crowns upon themselves; so did their sons after them many years: and evils were multiplied in the earth.

B. C. 175. 10 And there came out of them a wicked root, Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, son of Antiochus the king, who had been an hostage at place.] Ptolemy, son of Lagus, in Egypt; Pithon in Media; Antigonus in Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia; Eumenes the Cardian in Cappadocia; Leonnatus in Mysia; Lysimachus in Thrace; Menander in Lydia; Asander in Caria; Philotas in Cilicia; Laomedon in Syria; Antipater and Craterus, as guardians and regents for Philip Arrhidæus, in Macedon.

9. after his death they all put crowns upon themselves.] The author does not state that the crowns were assumed immediately after Alexander's death, nor does he, in all probability, intend his expression, "they all put crowns upon themselves," to be taken literally. The greater part of the chiefs above named did assume the diadem; and ultimately all the fragments of Alexander's empire became kingdoms under crowned rulers. It is the latter fact which the author has specially in his mind.

their sons after them.] All the monarchies formed out of Alexander's empire were hereditary, the right of succession belonging to the eldest son. Naturally, each such prince assumed the diadem on his father's demise.

many years.] From Alexander's death, in B.C. 323, to the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes, in B.C. 175, was a hundred and forty-eight years—nearly a century and a half. During the whole of this time "evils were multiplied upon the earth." Ewald says of "the Greek age," as he calls it: "The first decades of this period passed away amid the continuous wars of Alexander, and the still more devastating campaigns of his successors, which were little favourable to the fusion of the two nationalities. Beneath the tinsel of Greek culture the times were exceedingly disordered; and all the nations of Asia had much to suffer from the craving for new dominions and the perpetual wars of the successors of Alexander, whose own thirst for conquest was only quenched by death" ('History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 225, E. T.). Palestine was, during the whole period, the battle-ground between the rival powers of Egypt and Syria, whose armies were continually traversing the territory, and carrying fire and sword into its most sequestered districts and hamlets.

§ 2. ACCESSION OF ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, AND COMMENCEMENT OF HELLENIZING PRACTICES.

10–15. From his brief introductory sketch the writer passes at a bound to the special subject of his narrative—the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the events which grew out of it. After noting the accession of the hated monarch, he gives an account of the proceedings soon after taken by a Hellenizing party among the Jews themselves, who were opposed to the ordinary Hebrew exclusiveness, and desired a fusion with the heathen. This party had grown up by degrees under the Ptolemaic and Seleucid rule, and embraced a considerable portion of the upper and middle classes, who were attracted by the culture of the Greeks, by their light-heartedness, by the splendour of their cities, and the pleasurable character of their amusements. The Greeks had built numerous towns in Palestine; had introduced their language, literature, and art; had given the Jews privileges at Alexandria and elsewhere, and studied and appreciated to some extent the Jewish sacred writings. Without any violent efforts, such as those made by Epiphanes (vv. 41–61), there was serious danger of the Jews relinquishing all their peculiar tenets and usages, and becoming amalgamated with Greco-Macedonians.

10. a wicked root.] The word shôresh in Hebrew, and its correspondent, ῥίζα, in Greek, though properly meaning "root," are used also to denote a sprout or sapling which springs up from an old stem or stock. (Cf. Is. x. 10, liii. 2; Rev. v. 5, xxii. 16.) And this seems to be its sense here. On the "wickedness" of Antiochus Epiphanes, see Stanley's 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 288–9: "Antiochus IV. was one of those strange characters in whom an eccentricity, touching insanity on the left and genius on the right, combined with absolute power and lawless passion to produce a portentous result. . . . There was an extravagance, a littleness, in all his demeanour, which agrees with the unintelligible madman of the Gentile writers, and 'the vile person' of the Hebrew poets and historians."

Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes.] Or "illustrious." Appian ridiculously connects the epithet with the sudden appearance (ἐπιφάνεια) of the monarch on his return from his Roman captivity ('Syriaca,' § 45). But it had been previously borne by Ptolemy V. in Egypt, and is evidently on a par with the other flattering titles of the time, Euergetes, Philadelphus, Eupator, Callinicus, and the like. The coins of the king bear the title very commonly.

son of Antiochus.] Epiphanes succeeded

Digitized by Microsoft®

B.C. 175. Rome, and he reigned in the hundred and thirty and seventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks.

11 In those days went there out of Israel wicked men, who persuaded many, saying, Let us go and make a covenant with the heathen that are round about us: for since we departed from them ‖ we have had much sorrow. B.C. 174. ‖ Gr. many evils have found us.

12 So this device pleased them well.

13 Then certain of the people were so forward herein, that they went to the king, who gave them his brother, Seleucus IV., Philopator (2 Macc. iv. 7); but he was the son of Antiochus III., commonly called "Antiochus the Great." Antiochus III. reigned from B.C. 223 to B.C. 187; Seleucus IV. from that date to B.C. 175.

who had been an hostage at Rome.] The relative "who" refers to Epiphanes, and not to his father. When the Romans quarrelled with Antiochus the Great, and, having invaded Asia in force, defeated him at Magnesia (B.C. 190), they required him, as one of the terms of peace, to give hostages for his good behaviour. These were twenty in number; and among them was his younger son, Antiochus (Appian, 'Syriaca,' § 38). Shortly before his death (B.C. 176) Seleucus, the elder son and successor of Antiochus the Great, exchanged his own son, Demetrius, for his brother, Antiochus; and the latter was on his way home when Seleucus was murdered by Heliodorus, his treasurer (ibid. § 45).

the hundred and thirty and seventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks.] The "era of the Greeks" commenced in October, B.C. 312, when Seleucus Nicator assumed the diadem. The 137th year of the Greeks would consequently commence in October, B.C. 175, and terminate in October, B.C. 174. Epiphanes probably became king early in this interval. The Seleucid era was not only employed by the Syrians, and therefore, naturally, by their subjects the Jews, but was even adopted by the independent nation of the Parthians, and is found upon their coins down to the very close of the empire, A.D. 226. (See the author's 'Sixth Monarchy,' p. 367.)

11. In those days.] A common note of time in Hebrew and Hellenistic Greek. (See Ex. ii. 11; Judg. xviii. 1, xix. 1; 1 Sam. iii. 1; 2 Kings xx. 1; Matt. iii. 1, &c.) It always implies a certain vagueness, meaning, not "at that time," but "about that time."

went there out of Israel wicked men.] Grimm compares Deut. xiii. 13, where the LXX. have ἐξῆλθον ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ ἄνδρες παράνομοι. "Wicked men" was probably in the original "sons of Belial." The writer, it will be observed, does Epiphanes the justice to allow that the first steps in the Hellenizing movement, to which he is so much opposed, were taken by an irreligious party among the Jews themselves, who courted the change which Epiphanes afterwards strove to bring about. Such a latitudinarian spirit first shewed itself among the Jews in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, by whom it was sternly, and (as it would seem) for a time successfully, repressed (Ezra ix. and x.; Nehem. xiii. 1–28). Now it had once more broken out, and come to a head. The chief patron of the Hellenizing party was Joshua, a brother of the high-priest Onias, who Grecized his name into Jason, and, betaking himself to Antioch, entered into negotiations with Epiphanes, which had the results indicated in vv. 13–15.

Let us . . . make a covenant with the heathen that are round about us.] The author does not mean "with the surrounding heathen generally"—the Syrians, Phœnicians, Philistines, Arabians, Egyptians, &c.,—but only with the Greeks. The Greeks had planted so many cities in every part of Palestine, that they might well be said to dwell "round about" Judæa. That a definite "covenant," or agreement, was made between Jason and Epiphanes appears from 2 Macc. iv. 7–10.

since we departed from them.] I.e. "since we separated ourselves off from the rest of the world by our peculiar customs," or, in other words, "since we accepted the law of Moses as the law of the state."

we have had much sorrow.] Literally, as in the margin, "many evils have found us." No doubt certain inconveniences followed on the maintenance by the Jews of their exclusive position as "the people of God," separated from and exalted above all the nations of the earth. The heathen resented their exclusiveness, and were led to hamper their commerce, to inflict on them petty annoyances, and to make them the object of their ridicule. These inconveniences were magnified into "evils" by the Hellenizing party, who proposed to escape them by throwing down every barrier, and effecting a fusion of two incompatible religions and nationalities.

12. this device pleased them well.] Literally, "the saying was good in their eyes"—i.e. "what was said pleased them."

13. they went to the king.] Compare 2 Macc. iv. 7–10, where we learn that Jason, the brother of the high-priest Onias, led the embassy.

B.C. 174. licence to do after the ordinances of the heathen:

14 Whereupon [a] they ‖ built a place of exercise at Jerusalem according to the customs of the heathen:

15 And [b] made themselves uncircumcised, and forsook the holy covenant, and joined themselves to the heathen, and [c] were sold to do mischief.

16 Now when the kingdom was established before Antiochus, he

B.C. 174.

[a] 2 Mac. 4. 12.
‖ Or, set up an open school at Jerusalem.
[b] 1 Cor. 7. 18.
[c] 1 Kings 21. 25.

171.

who gave them licence.] It would seem (from 2 Macc. vii. 9) that a royal licence was needed for the opening of a palæstra, or gymnasium, at Jerusalem. Possibly such a licence was required everywhere, since the gymnasia were centres of attraction, and too many provincial gymnasia would be viewed with jealousy by the metropolis. But perhaps the need arose from the peculiar circumstances of Jerusalem, where it may have been thought that the event might produce an outbreak, and that therefore the express authorization of the king was necessary.

14. Whereupon they built a place of exercise.] Or "gymnasium." Gymnasia were courts surrounded by walls, and containing exercise-grounds, rooms, and porticoes, intended for the bodily training of both youths and adults. Their most essential features were an open space, usually either square or oblong, surrounded by colonnades, in which most of the exercises—e.g. wrestling, leaping, throwing the quoit, boxing, and throwing the javelin—were performed; a stadium, or course for the foot-race; and a xystus, or quiet recreation-ground, usually planted with trees. Among the rooms were one for dressing and undressing, a cold-bath room, a hot-bath room, a room where oil was rubbed in, a perspiring-room (sudatorium), a cooling-room (frigidarium), and others. The rooms and exercise-grounds were continually thronged by those who frequented the gymnasia for gymnastic purposes; the porticoes furnished agreeable lounges for philosophers, rhetoricians, artists, and spectators, who wished to while away a leisure hour. Dean Stanley says with much force, in speaking of the erection of this first gymnasium in Jerusalem, "It is startling to think of the sudden influx of Grecian manners into the very centre of Palestine. The modesty of the sons and daughters of Abraham was shocked by the establishment of the Greek palæstra under the very citadel of David (2 Macc. iv. 12), where, in defiance of some of the most sensitive feelings of their countrymen, the most active of the Jewish youths completely stripped themselves, and ran, wrestled, leaped in the public sports, like the Grecian athletes, wearing only the broad-brimmed hat, in imitation of the head-gear of the god Hermes, guardian of the gymnastic festivals. Even the priests in the Temple caught the infection (2 Macc. iv. 14), left their sacrificial duties unfinished, and ran down from the Temple court to take part in the spectacle, as soon as they heard the signal for throwing the discus, which was to lead off the games." ('Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 291.)

15. And made themselves uncircumcised.] I.e. sought to conceal their circumcision by means of a further surgical operation. (See Celsus, 'De Medic.' vii. 18; and compare 1 Cor. vii. 18.)

forsook the holy covenant.] "The holy covenant" is not so much the covenant of circumcision made with Abraham (Gen. xvii. 10), as that far broader covenant made between God and His people at Sinai (Ex. xxiv. 3–8). The expression seems to be adopted from Dan. xi. 28–30, where it is used three times in connection with the wicked doings of Epiphanes.

joined themselves to the heathen.] Literally, "yoked themselves." (Compare 2 Cor. vi. 14.)

were sold to do mischief.] Compare 1 Kings xxi. 20, 25; 2 Kings xvii. 17.

§ 3. The War of Epiphanes with Egypt.

16–19. The war of Antiochus Epiphanes with Egypt was not a pure war of aggression. It was provoked by the Egyptian king, Ptolemy VI. (Philometor), who claimed Cœlesyria and Palestine as the dowry of his mother, Cleopatra, and, when Epiphanes refused to yield them, flew to arms and actually invaded the Syrian territory (B.C. 172). Antiochus in B.C. 171, having collected a considerable army, undertook the recovery of the places occupied by the Egyptians, and, having succeeded in his object so far, pressed forward into Egypt, defeated the forces of Ptolemy at Pelusium, and endeavoured to make himself master of the whole country. He would probably have succeeded, had not the Romans interposed, and required him to relinquish his conquests.

16. when the kingdom was established.] Compare 1 Kings ii. 12, 46; 2 Chr. i. 1; 2 Kings xiv. 5. There was usually a time of trouble at the commencement of an Oriental monarch's reign, at the end of which his power became "established." Epiphanes' troubles lasted from B.C. 175 to B.C. 171.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B.C. 171. thought to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two realms.

17 Wherefore he entered into Egypt [d] with a great multitude, with chariots, and elephants, and horsemen, and a great navy,

18 And made war against Ptolemee king of Egypt: but Ptolemee was afraid of him, and fled; and many were wounded to death. B.C. 170

19 Thus they got the strong cities in the land of Egypt, and he took the spoils thereof.

20 And after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, he returned again in the hundred forty and third year, and [e] went up against Israel 169.

[d] Dan. 11. 25.

[e] Dan. 8. 12.

he thought to reign over Egypt.] Antiochus can scarcely have begun the war with this expectation; but after the battle of Pelusium he no doubt entertained the idea. Had it not been for the Romans, he would probably have effected his purpose.

of two realms.] Rather, "of the two realms"—i.e. Syria and Egypt.

17. he entered into Egypt with a great multitude.] Rather, "with a strong force." Compare Dan. xi. 25. The number of his forces is nowhere recorded.

chariots, and elephants, and horsemen.] The employment of war-chariots by the Seleucidæ is noticed by Appian ('Syriaca,' § 52), Livy (xxxvii. 40), and others. They are said to have been armed with spears projecting from the pole, and scythes (or rather sickles) attached to the naves of the wheels and the ends of the yokes (Liv. xxxvii. 41; compare 2 Macc. xiii. 2). Elephants were also employed by the Syrian kings in large numbers (Liv. xxxvii. 40, xxxviii. 38; Polyb. xxii. 26, xxxi. 3, &c.). Eighty are said to have been brought by Lysias against Jerusalem (2 Macc. xi. 4).

and a great navy.] The march of armies from Syria into Egypt, or from Egypt into Syria, is much facilitated by the support of a "navy." The great Pharaohs of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties made Syrian expeditions both by land and sea (Brugsch, 'Hist. of Egypt,' vol. i. pp. 371–3, &c.). So did the Psammetichi (Herod. ii. 159, 161). When Cambyses invaded Egypt, he took care to be accompanied by Greek and Phœnician ships (ib. iii. 13, 19). Alexander's long delay at Tyre when on his way to Egypt was to secure a naval force. A navy is especially needed when the attack is made from Syria, since not only is it serviceable for conveying supplies, but necessary in order to command the Egyptian waters. The fleet of Epiphanes is mentioned by Livy (xliv. 19; xlv. 11). It proved stronger than the Egyptian fleet.

18. Ptolemee king of Egypt.] This king was Ptolemy VI., called Philometor, the son of Ptolemy Epiphanes and of Cleopatra, Antiochus's sister. He was a weak prince, and no more than seventeen years of age at the time of Antiochus's invasion.

Ptolemee was afraid of him, and fled.] This is scarcely in accordance with the history as it has come down to us from other writers. At the first great battle near Pelusium Ptolemy appears not to have been present (Diod. Sic. p. 579, ed. Wesseling). Afterwards, fearing perhaps the consequences of further resistance, he submitted to his uncle, and became his tool; but he never fled from any show of force, much less from any actual engagement.

19. they got the strong cities.] As Pelusium, Memphis, and others. Alexandria still held out under Ptolemy Physcon, the brother of Philometor, whom the Egyptians had placed at their head when Philometor submitted to Antiochus.

§ 4. THE RETURN OF ANTIOCHUS FROM EGYPT, AND HIS PROCEEDINGS AT JERUSALEM.

20. he returned again.] The return of Antiochus to Syria in the winter of B.C. 170–169 was partly in consequence of his inability to capture Alexandria, partly on account of the interference of the Romans (Polyb. xxviii. 15, ad fin.), whom he did not dare to defy. His proud spirit must have been deeply hurt at the issue of his two years' war; and he was consequently prepared to vent his pent-up anger on the first victim that offered itself.

and went up against Israel and Jerusalem.] A pretext was found in the series of events related in 2 Macc. iv. 23–43; v. 5–7. Jason, outbid and deprived of the high-priesthood by Menelaus, had raised a rebellion, and obtained certain successes. Various other troubles had occurred. But the real ground of the attack was cupidity. The Syrian treasury was exhausted, and needed to be replenished. The wealth of the Temple was well known, and had already provoked one attempt (2 Macc. iii. 6–40). Now another was to be made with greater success. The angry king, smarting under disappointments incurred in Egypt, leads his army against Jerusalem, and, though unresisted, treats it as a captured city.

B. C. 169. and Jerusalem with a great multitude,

21 And f entered proudly into the sanctuary, and took away the golden altar, and the candlestick of light, and all the vessels thereof,

22 And the table of the shewbread, and the pouring vessels, and the vials, and the censers of gold, and the veil, and the crowns, and the golden ornaments that were before the temple, ‖ all which he pulled off.

23 He took also the silver and the gold, and the ‖ precious vessels: also he took the hidden treasures which he found.

24 And when he had taken all away, he went into his own land, having made a great massacre, and spoken very proudly.

25 Therefore there was great mourning in Israel, in every place where they were;

26 So that the princes and elders

f Dan. 11. 31.

‖ Or, he pilled all things.

B. C. 169.

‖ Gr. desirable.

21. entered proudly into the sanctuary.] The assault and capture of the city, enlarged upon in 2 Macc. v. 11–14, are omitted by the present writer, who cares for nothing in comparison with the profanation of the Holy Place, and the other sacrilegious acts of the misguided king. Menelaus, the apostate high-priest, served as guide to Epiphanes on the occasion (2 Macc. v. 15), and led him into the inner sanctuary, or Holy of Holies (Diod. Sic. xxxi. 1, 48).

the golden altar.] I.e. the altar of incense, which stood inside the Temple, just in front of the veil. (Compare Ex. xxx. 1–6; 1 Kings vii. 48.) Solomon's altar was no doubt carried off by Nebuchadnezzar; but a similar one had been made and placed within the Temple by Zerubbabel or Ezra.

the candlestick of light.] The seven-branched lampstand, which stood against the south wall of the Holy Place (Ex. xxv. 31–37; xl. 24), and was an essential part of the Temple furniture (2 Chr. xiii. 11). Such a "candlestick," however often carried off, was always restored; and the Arch of Titus shews us that the Romans found one in the Temple when they finally captured and destroyed it.

the vessels thereof.] The "lamps," "tongs," and "snuff-dishes" of Ex. xxv. 37, 38, which were all "of pure gold."

22. And the table of the shewbread.] See Ex. xxv. 23–30; 1 Kings vii. 48.

the pouring vessels and the vials.] In the original σπονδεῖα καὶ φιάλας—"flagons and chalices"—vessels to contain the wine for the drink-offerings, and cups or goblets out of which to pour them. Compare Ex. xxv. 29, xxxvii. 16; where, however, the φιάλαι are called κύαθοι.

the censers of gold.] Incense-pots, in which incense was offered on the table of shewbread, together with the loaves (Lev. xxiv. 5). They are mentioned in Ex. xxv. 29 and xxxvii. 16 (where the A.V. translates by "spoons"), and are represented on the Arch of Titus.

the veil.] See Ex. xxvi. 31, xl. 21; 2 Chron. iii. 14.

the crowns.] Compare below, ch. iv. 57. Whether these "crowns" were votive offerings hung in front of the Temple, or the capitals of the pillars of the porch, is uncertain.

the golden ornaments that were before the temple . . . he pulled off.] Much of the ornamentation consisted of woodwork plated with gold (Ex. xxvi. 29; 1 Kings vi. 20–22; 2 Kings xviii. 16). This Epiphanes stripped off.

23. the silver and the gold and the precious vessels.] I.e. all the gold and silver vessels that he found in the Temple—an example of hendiadys.

also . . . the hidden treasures.] I.e. the contents of the various treasuries, whether public or private. (See Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' ii. 9, § 4; 2 Macc. iii. 10–12.) The value of the precious metals carried off was estimated at 1800 silver talents, or nearly 350,000*l.* (See 2 Macc. v. 21.)

24. having made a great massacre.] At his entry, not at his departure (2 Macc. v. 12–14). The slain were estimated at 80,000; but this was probably an exaggeration.

§ 5. The Mourning of the Jews after his Departure.

25–28. Words are poor to tell of the effect on the Jewish mind of these terrible calamities. Nothing like them had occurred since the destruction of the first Temple by Nebuchadnezzar. The fact that Heliodorus had been so recently baffled in a somewhat similar attempt (2 Macc. iii. 14–29) must have made them the more unexpected. The writer graphically describes in four short verses the general consternation.

26. the princes and elders.] Probably the same as the "council" or "senate" of 1 Macc. xii. 6, and of 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, xi. 27—a body corresponding to the later Sanhedrin,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 170. mourned, the virgins and young men were made feeble, and the beauty of women was changed.

27 Every bridegroom took up lamentation, and she that sat in the marriage chamber was in heaviness.

28 The land also was moved for the inhabitants thereof, and all the house of Jacob was covered with confusion.

167. 29 And after two years fully expired ℰ the king sent his chief collector of tribute unto the cities of Juda, who came unto Jerusalem with a great multitude, ℰ 2 Mac. 5. 24.

30 And spake peaceable words unto them, but all was deceit: for when they had given him credence, he fell suddenly upon the city, and smote it very sore, and destroyed much people of Israel. B. C. 167.

31 And when he had taken the spoils of the city, he set it on fire, and pulled down the houses and walls thereof on every side.

32 But the women and children took they captive, and possessed the cattle.

33 Then builded they the city of David with a great and strong wall, which was composed of chief priests (heads of courses), elders, and scribes.

§ 6. Second Attack upon Jerusalem, by Apollonius, Chief Collector of Tribute.

29–32. The circumstances of this attack are given with some particularity in 2 Macc. v. 24–27. We find there the name of the leader, Apollonius; the number of his army, 22,000 men; and the fact that the attack was made on the sabbath day, suddenly and without a pretext, by the armed soldiers, who had been received peaceably into the town, upon the unarmed Judæans. The intention must have been the same as that of certain fusillards in a neighbouring capital in our own day—to strike terror into the inhabitants and reduce them into a state of abject subservience.

29. after two years.] In December B.C. 168, or January B.C. 167 (Clinton, 'F. H.' vol. iii. p. 321).

fully expired.] Literally, "years of days"—a Hebraism. Compare Gen. xli. 1; Lev. xxv. 29; 2 Sam. xiii. 25, &c.

with a great multitude.] Rather, "with a strong force"—an army of 22,000 men (2 Macc. v. 24).

30. spake peaceable words.] Compare 2 Macc. v. 25; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 5, § 4. Had he come as an open enemy, the inhabitants might have shut the gates, and stood on their defence with a good prospect of success.

but all was deceit.] Rather, "deceitfully."

he fell suddenly upon the city.] Waiting for the sabbath, he gave his soldiers orders to arm themselves, and, sallying forth into the streets, to kill all the men whom they met in any part of the town. The women and children they were to seize and sell for slaves. (See 2 Macc. v. 24–26.) The sale of these numerous captives (as Ewald notes) "helped to fill the empty treasury of the king."

31. he set it on fire.] There can scarcely have been any intention to burn the city, or the intention would have been carried out. Probably, in the confusion of the plundering, various houses were set on fire accidentally.

pulled down the houses and walls.] I.e. demolished the fortifications, or at any rate broke large breaches in them, and destroyed such houses as abutted on the demolished portions of the walls.

32. and possessed the cattle.] On the keeping of cattle within the precincts of cities in ancient times, see Jonah iv. 11. The word employed (κτήνη) will, in its Hellenistic use, include horses.

§ 7. Permanent Occupation of a part of Jerusalem by the Syrians.

33–37. The object of the occupation of "the city of David" was clearly to molest such Jews as wished to visit the Temple from the "upper city" by crossing the Tyropœon, and at the same time to make into a special Syrian stronghold the most commanding position in the whole town. It is to be remembered that the "acra," or "citadel," as it was called, overlooked the Temple (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, 7).

33. the city of David.] It is generally agreed that this means the special hill on which had stood the palace of David. But the position of this hill is questioned. Most writers regard it as a portion of the high ground north, or rather north-west, of the Temple. But Colonel Warren, with the most complete local knowledge, has recently argued that it was a portion of the western hill, opposite the Temple ('Transactions of Society of

B. C. 167. and with mighty towers, and made it a strong hold for them.

34 And they put therein a sinful nation, wicked men, and fortified themselves therein.

35 They stored it also with armour and victuals, and when they had gathered together the spoils of Jerusalem, they laid them up there, and so they became a sore snare:

36 For it was a place to lie in wait against the sanctuary, and an evil adversary to Israel.

37 Thus they shed innocent blood on every side of the sanctuary, and defiled it:

38 Insomuch that the inhabitants of Jerusalem fled because of them: whereupon the city was made an habitation of strangers, and became strange to those that were born in her; and her own children left her. B. C. 167.

39 Her sanctuary was laid waste like a wilderness, [h] her feasts were turned into mourning, her sabbaths into reproach, her honour into contempt. [h] Tobit 2. 6. 2 Mac. 6. 6.

40 As had been her glory, so was her dishonour increased, and her excellency was turned into mourning.

Bibl. Archæology,' vol. vii. pp. 309–315). The whole question of the topography of ancient Jerusalem is still undetermined.

a great and strong wall, and with mighty towers.] All the early fortifications consisted of projecting towers, square or round, with a curtain between them (Rawlinson, 'Ancient Monarchies,' vol. ii. p. 405; vol. iii. pp. 76, 82; 'History of Egypt,' vol. i. p. 465; Herod. i. 179, &c.). Numerous towers in the wall of Jerusalem are mentioned by Nehemiah (ch. iii. 1, 11, 25, 26, 27).

a strong hold.] In the original, ἄκρα, a "citadel," or "acropolis." The word became the proper name of this fortress.

34. a sinful nation.] Compare Tobit xiii. 6. The Jews divide the world into Jews and Gentiles—"the righteous" and "sinners." Here, however, something more is meant. The Syrian Greeks, as the aiders and abettors of Epiphanes, were considered to be sinners in an especial sense. See the words which follow—"wicked men"—and compare ch. ii. 48, 62; iii. 15, 20, &c.

35. they became a sore snare.] We should read ἐγένετο here, rather than ἐγένοντο, and translate—"It became a sore snare." Dean Stanley says: "It was regarded as a perpetual tempter, an adversary or devil in stone—as a personal enemy" ('Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 295). Compare v. 36. Hence the joy and rejoicing when ultimately it was captured (infra, xiii. 51).

§ 8. FLIGHT OF THE GODLY JEWS, AND SUPPRESSION OF THE JEWISH RELIGION.

38–53. Unable to frequent the Temple by reason of the perpetual sallies made upon them from the Acra, the religious Jews quitted Jerusalem and gave it up to the Hellenizing party. Antiochus hereupon, regarding all opposition as over, launched his Edict of Intolerance—"That all should be one people, and that every one should leave his laws" (vv. 41, 42). A special commissioner was sent down from Antioch to enforce the king's orders (2 Macc. vi. 1). Not only was the practice of the Jewish religion or the observance of any of its ceremonies forbidden under penalty of death (v. 50), but active participation in the abominations of idol worship was required of all (v. 47; compare 2 Macc. vi. 7). The possession of the sacred writings was also made a capital offence (v. 57). Under the chief commissioner were appointed "overseers," whose business it was to carry out the king's orders in all the various cities and towns throughout the whole of Judæa. The determination was to stamp out the Jewish religion absolutely and utterly, and to establish the sensual idolatry of the Greeks in its place.

38. the city was made an habitation of strangers.] This must not be understood too broadly. Menelaus, the high-priest, remained at Jerusalem with his partisans, and gave the support of his authority to all the measures of Antiochus. It was among the most bitter trials of the faithful, that many of their own countrymen took part with the heathen against them. (See vv. 43 and 52.)

39. Her sanctuary was laid waste.] Rather "was empty" or "desolate." It was no part of the policy of Epiphanes to destroy, or even to injure, the Temple building. He proposed to retain it as the centre of the new religious worship which he was about to set up. (See 2 Macc. vi. 2–4.)

her feasts were turned into mourning.] As prophesied by Amos (viii. 10), whose words,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 167. 41 Moreover king Antiochus wrote to his whole kingdom, that all should be one people, 42 And every one should leave his laws: so all the heathen agreed according to the commandment of the king.

43 Yea, many also of the Israelites consented to his religion, and sacrificed unto idols, and profaned the sabbath.

44 For the king had sent letters by messengers unto Jerusalem and the cities of Juda, that they should follow ‖ the strange laws of the land,

‖ Or, the laws and rites of the strangers of the land.

45 And forbid burnt offerings, and sacrifice, and drink offerings, in the temple; and that they should profane the sabbaths and festival days:

46 And pollute the sanctuary and holy people: B. C. 167.

47 Set up altars, and groves, and chapels of idols, and sacrifice swine's flesh, and unclean beasts:

48 That they should also leave their children uncircumcised, and make their souls abominable with all manner of uncleanness and profanation:

49 To the end they might forget the law, and change all the ordinances.

50 And [i] whosoever would not do according to the commandment of the king, he said, he should die. [i] 2 Mac. 6. 9.

51 In the selfsame manner wrote he to his whole kingdom, and [k] appointed [k] 2 Mac. 5. 22.

as rendered by the LXX., are here closely followed.

41. king Antiochus wrote to his whole kingdom.] The special edict directed against the Jews (vv. 44–50) seems to have been preceded by a general proclamation of uniformity in religion throughout the whole kingdom. This was a sort of blind, there being no very clear intention of forcing changes on any people except the Jews. Hence the heathen nations generally "agreed" to the edict. (See v. 42, and compare ch. ii. 19; but, on the other hand, see ch. iii. 29.)

43. many . . . of the Israelites consented.] See note on v. 38.

44. letters . . . unto Jerusalem.] By the hand of the special commissioner deputed to see the royal commands carried out (2 Macc. vi. 1).

the strange laws of the land.] Rather, as in the margin, "the laws (or customs) of the strangers of the land"—i.e. the Syrian Greeks.

45. burnt offerings, and sacrifice, and drink offerings.] I.e. offerings of any kind.

46. And pollute . . . holy people.] I.e. the godly, the faithful. The readiest mode of pollution was forcing them to eat swine's flesh. (See 2 Macc. vi. 18–31; vii. 1.)

47. groves.] Rather, "precincts." The "groves" of the Old Testament are certainly not intended. These were idolatrous emblems in wood or metal, resembling probably the "sacred tree" of the Assyrians. (See the author's 'Ancient Monarchies,' vol. ii. p. 236.) "Precincts" (τεμένη) were sacred enclosures, surrounded by walls, and generally containing within them a temple or shrine.

chapels of idols.] Or "idol temples." (See 1 Cor. viii. 10.) The word εἰδωλεῖον is used of the heathen temples generally, ναὸς or νεὼς being reserved for the temples of the true God.

unclean beasts.] Literally, "common." Compare Acts x. 14, 15, 28; and for an account of the animals which were "unclean" to the Jews, see Lev. xi. 3–30. The swine was the only animal offered commonly in sacrifice by heathen nations, which the Jews might not offer.

48. That they should . . . leave their children uncircumcised.] Could circumcision have been abolished, the whole distinction between Jew and Gentile would very shortly have been done away. Circumcision admitted into covenant; and without it a Jew would have felt that he was not a Jew, but a mere uncovenanted heathen. Hence the strenuous efforts made to stop circumcision (vv. 60, 61; 2 Macc. vi. 10, viii. 4, &c.).

50. he should die.] Like other thoroughgoing persecutors — Diocletian, Galerius, Isdigerd II., the Inquisition—Epiphanes enforced conformity under the penalty of death. This heroic remedy necessarily results in either submission or insurrection.

51. In the selfsame manner wrote he to his whole kingdom.] I.e. mutatis mutandis. But it may be questioned whether any religions but the Jewish and Samaritan were seriously threatened. The various forms of polytheism were too nearly allied to quarrel, and readily understood one another. The Phœnician, Syrian, and Babylonian deities had all of them their Greek counterparts; and a syncretic spirit was so generally prevalent, that we need stronger evidence than is anywhere forth-

B. C. 167. pointed overseers over all the people, commanding the cities of Juda to sacrifice, city by city.

52 Then many of the people were gathered unto them, to wit, every one that forsook the law; and so they committed evils in the land;

53 ‖And [l]drove the Israelites into secret places, even wheresoever they could flee for succour.

54 Now the fifteenth day of the month Casleu, in the hundred forty and fifth year, they set up [m]the abomination of desolation upon the altar, and builded idol altars throughout the cities of Juda on every side;

55 And burnt incense at the doors of their houses, and in the streets.

56 And when they had rent in pieces the books of the law which they found, they burnt them with fire.

B. C. cir. 167.

‖ Or, And they made Israel hide themselves in holes in every place of succour.

[l] 2 Mac. 6. 11. Heb. 11. 38. See ch. 2. 31, 36, 41. cir. 168.

[m] Dan. 11. 31.

coming to convince us that Epiphanes contemplated imposing on all his subjects complete religious uniformity.

and appointed overseers.] Ewald views these "overseers" as "an army of spies and wardens, accusers and watchmen" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 299); but Dean Stanley is probably right in regarding them as local commissioners, acting under the chief commissioner, and carrying out the king's behests in the provinces ('Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 295).

52. many of the people were gathered unto them.] A Hellenizing faction shewed itself in all parts of the land, not in Judæa only, but also in Samaria (2 Macc. vi. 2) and Galilee (1 Macc. v. 15).

53. drove the Israelites into secret places.] To escape the persecution of the "overseers," the Israelites were compelled to betake themselves to hiding-places—caves, deserts, and hill fastnesses (2 Macc. v. 27)—just as had been done of old by David and his companions (1 Sam. xx.–xxvi.) when they fled from Saul.

§ 9. The Abomination of Desolation set up in the Temple, and the Persecution carried on relentlessly.

54–64. The finishing touch was now to be put to the whole scheme of persecution. The daily sacrifice had been already abolished (v. 45); but, to prevent any pious Jew from surreptitiously offering it, the altar itself was to be polluted by a permanent erection. On the 15th of Chisleu (December B.C. 168, or January B.C. 167) an altar to the Olympian Jupiter was set up on the top of the brazen altar of burnt sacrifice erected by Zerubbabel (Ezra iii. 2, 3); and ten days afterwards the profanation was completed by the offering of sacrifice to Jupiter upon the new altar. At the same time images of heathen gods were set up at the doors of houses and in the streets, and incense burnt to them. The Books of the Law were searched for, and, when found, were burnt. A vigorous persecution of all who disobeyed the royal edicts was commenced. The mothers of children who had been recently circumcised were put to death with the children, and the dead bodies of the latter were hung about the mothers' necks. Those by whom the operation had been performed were likewise executed. Attempts were made to compel men to eat unclean meats, and their refusal to do so was also punished with death. The author of the Second Book of Maccabees goes into considerable detail on these subjects, relating at length some particular instances of cruel punishments (2 Macc. vi. 10–31; vii. 1–42).

54. they set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar.] That "the abomination of desolation" was an altar appears from v. 59. The phrase is not previously used in the Septuagint, though nearly allied to one in Daniel ix. 27, where an "abomination of desolations" is mentioned. The expression in Dan. xi. 31, which refers to the event here recorded, is different. It had been customary from the time of Moses to call idolatrous objects "abominations." The present writer goes further, and marks his hatred of this particular object by attaching to it a further epithet of abhorrence.

and builded idol altars.] "Idol altars" (βωμοί) are contrasted with the altar of God (θυσιαστήριον). It was common among the Greeks to erect such altars in the streets of towns before images of gods and goddesses, especially Hermes, Dionysus, Apollo, and Artemis. Hence these deities were sometimes spoken of as θεοὶ ἀγυιεῖς—"deities of the street."

55. burnt incense at the doors of their houses.] It was usual in Greek towns to place images of the household gods in the vestibules or porches of houses (Döllinger, 'Jew and Gentile,' vol. i. p. 242, E. T.), and to offer to them incense, cakes, and other sacrificial dainties. Artemis was sometimes honoured in this way, and was then called προθυραία ('Orph. Hymn.' i. 4).

56. when they had rent in pieces the books

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

57 And wheresoever was found with any the book of the testament, or if any consented to the law, ‖ the king's commandment was, that they should put him to death.

‖ Gr. the king's commandment put him to death.

58 Thus did they by their authority unto the Israelites every month, to as many as were found in the cities.

59 Now the five and twentieth day of the month they did sacrifice upon the idol altar, which was upon the altar of God.

60 At which time according to the commandment [n] they put to death certain women, ‖ that had caused their children to be circumcised.

[n] 2 Mac. 6. 10.

‖ Gr. that had circumcised their children.

61 And they hanged the infants about their necks, and rifled their houses and slew them that had circumcised them.

B. C. cir. 167

62 Howbeit many in Israel were fully resolved and confirmed in themselves not to eat any unclean thing.

63 Wherefore they [o] chose rather to die, that they might not be defiled with meats, and that they might not profane the holy covenant: so then they died.

[o] 2 Mac. 6. 19. & 7. 1, &c.

64 And there was very great wrath upon Israel.

CHAPTER II.

6 Mattathias lamenteth the case of Jerusalem. 24 He slayeth a Jew that did sacrifice to idols in his presence, and the king's messenger also. 34 He and his are assailed upon the sabbath, and make no resistance. 50 He dieth, and instructeth his sons; 66 and maketh their brother Judas Maccabeus general.

of the law they burnt them.] Compare the conduct of Zedekiah (Jer. xxxvi. 23). Hatred of God's Word leads wicked men to make its destruction sure.

57. wheresoever was found with any the book of the testament.] Rather, "a book of the covenant"—i.e. any one of the five books of Moses. It is implied that private persons not unfrequently possessed a portion, if not the whole, of the Pentateuch. A great multiplication of copies had followed on the institution of "scribes."

if any consented to the law.] Mere observance of the law, apart from possession of any portion of it, was made a capital offence.

58. every month.] It would seem that each town was visited once a month by its inspector, and a bloody assize held. The country districts were probably under less strict surveillance.

59. they did sacrifice upon the idol altar.] Diodorus (xxxiv. 1) says that a herd of a hundred swine was driven into the Temple and slaughtered in the sacred precincts. One huge sow was chosen out of the number for sacrifice upon the newly-erected altar, on which a portion of its blood was poured, while another portion was taken inside the Temple building and poured out within the Holy of Holies. (Compare Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 5, § 4.)

60. that had caused their children to be circumcised.] Literally, "that had circumcised their children." But no doubt the meaning is that they had authorized the act. See the next verse. From 2 Macc. vi. 10 we gather that only two women were treated with this extreme barbarity rifled their houses.] I.e. gave them up to pillage.

61. they hanged the infants about their necks.] Partly to aggravate the sufferings of the mothers; but also to ensure the death of the children, who were precipitated with their mothers from the top of the city wall (2 Macc. l. s. c.).

slew them that had circumcised them.] I.e. put to death those who had performed the rite.

63. they chose rather to die, that they might not be defiled with meats.] On the modes of compulsion used, and the noble resistance made, see 2 Macc. vi. 18–31 and vii. 1–41.

64. there was very great wrath upon Israel.] The persecution of Epiphanes was looked upon as a judgment sent upon the nation by God on account of its sins. The very martyrs themselves took this view, and acknowledged God's justice in the chastisement (2 Macc. vi. 18, 33). It may be concluded from this that Ps. lxxiv. does not belong to the period, since it contains no confessions of national ill-desert.

CHAPTER II.

§ 1. The Family of Mattathias.

1–5. The desperate strait in which the Jewish nation was placed having been sufficiently set forth in ch. i., the writer proceeds in ch. ii. to a theme that is more congenial to him—the mode of the national deliverance; and as this was the special work of a single family, he commences this portion of his history with an account of the family, so far

B. C. 167. IN those days ‖ arose Mattathias the son of John, the son of Simeon, a priest of the sons of [a] Joarib, from Jerusalem, and dwelt in Modin.

2 And he had five sons, Joannan, ‖ called ‖ Caddis:

3 Simon, called Thassi:

4 Judas, who was called Maccabeus:

5 Eleazar, called ‖ Avaran: and Jonathan, whose surname was Apphus.

B. C. 167.

‖ Or, Mattathias the son of John, &c. arose from Jerusalem, or, out of Jerusalem.

‖ Or, Avaron, or, Abaron: See ch. 6. 43.

[a] 1 Chron. 24. 7. ‖ Or, who was called: and so afterward in the rest. ‖ Gaddis.

as it was known to him. Mattathias, its chief at the time when the sanctuary was profaned, he traces back through two progenitors, his father and his grandfather, to the great priestly clan or course of Joarib (or Jehoiarib), to which David and Solomon had assigned the first place among the attendants on the altar (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). He represents him as having been, at the time when the persecution began, a dweller in Jerusalem, but as having fled thence and taken refuge in his ancestral city, Modeïn, where he was "an honourable man" and "a ruler" (v. 8). He was accompanied by his five sons (three of whom became personages of importance)—Joannan or John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. Each of these youths enjoyed the distinction of a second name.

1. Mattathias.] The name is not wholly new. A "Mattathiah" had supported Ezra when he came forward to read the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4). Two others appear in St. Luke's genealogy of our Lord (Luke iii. 25, 26).

a priest of the sons of Joarib.] That descendants of Joarib, or Jehoiarib, returned from the Captivity is declared in 1 Chr. ix. 10 and Neh. xi. 10, xii. 6, 19.

in Modin.] More properly "Modeïn" or "Modeïm." The place has not been mentioned in the Hebrew Scriptures, and occurs only in connection with Maccabean history (ch. ii. 70; ix. 19; xiii. 25, 30; xvi. 4; 2 Macc. xiii. 14). It appears by 1 Macc. xvi. to have lain on the edge of the hill-country overlooking the Philistine plain; and here Jerome places it ('Onomast.' ad voc. MODIM), near Diospolis, or Lydda (now Ludd). The exact site is disputed.

2. Joannan.] The name is identical with the Johanan or Jehohanan of the Hebrew Scriptures (1 Chr. iii. 15, 24; vi. 9, 10; Jer. xl. 8–16, &c.). It means "Jehovah gave." On the after-career of Joannan see ch. ix. 36–38, and 2 Macc. viii. 22 (where he is by mistake called "Joseph").

called Caddis.] There is no traditional interpretation of this surname. It may perhaps represent the Hebrew "Gaddi" (Num. xiii. 11), which seems to be a denominative formed from "Gad," "fortune," and to mean "fortunate." Compare the Roman "Felix." Or, possibly, it is a transliteration of the Chaldee קַדִּישׁ, "holy."

3. Simon.] The career of Simon occupies chaps. xiii.–xv. and ch. xvi. 1–16. He was the fourth Maccabee leader.

called Thassi.] The Syriac has "Tharsi," which may mean "director," or "guide," since Simon was "a man of counsel" (v. 65).

4. Judas, who was called Maccabeus.] Judas was selected by his father to succeed him as leader (ch. ii. 16). His exploits occupy chaps. iii.–ix. 1–17. He is the great hero of the Second Book of Maccabees. His surname of Maccabeus has been variously derived: 1, from the Hebrew maccâbâh, "a hammer;" 2, from chabah, "to extinguish;" 3, from עקב, in the sense of "to track" or "trace out." (See the Introduction to Judith, § IV.)

5. Eleazar, called Avaran.] The surname of Eleazar is given as "Savaran" in ch. vi. 43. The true form, however, is probably Avaran, which may be connected with the Chaldee and Syriac חוּר, "to be pale." For the exploit from which Eleazar got his name, see ch. vi. 43–46.

Jonathan, whose surname was Apphus.] On the exploits of Jonathan, see chs. ix.–xii. His surname, Apphus, is thought to mean "the Dissembler," and to have been given him on account of his first exploit against the Beni-Jambri, who had slain his brother John (ch. ix. 37–41).

§ 2. THE LAMENT OF MATTATHIAS OVER JERUSALEM.

6–14. This genuine outpour of natural grief has all the appearance of being a contemporary document, and may well have been the composition of the aged priest on the occasion in question. It is composed on the model of the Davidic Psalms, but with somewhat less of exact balance in the clauses than is customary. The rhythmic effect is wholly spoiled by the arrangement into verses which our translators have followed; the true arrangement is as follows:—

"Woe is me! Wherefore was I born to see the misery of my people,
And the misery of the Holy City?
And to dwell there when it was delivered into the hand of the enemy,
And the sanctuary into the hand of strangers?

B. C. cir. 167.

6 And when he saw the blasphemies that were committed in Juda and Jerusalem,

7 He said, Woe is me! wherefore was I born to see this misery of my people, and of the holy city, and to dwell there, when it was delivered into the hand of the enemy, and the sanctuary into the hand of strangers?

8 Her temple is become as a man without glory.

[b] ch. i. 23, 24.

9 [b] Her glorious vessels are carried away into captivity, her infants are slain in the streets, her young men with the sword of the enemy.

10 What nation hath not had a part in her kingdom, and gotten of her spoils?

B. C. cir. 167.

11 All her ornaments are taken away; of a free woman she is become a bondslave.

12 And, behold, our ‖ sanctuary, even our beauty and our glory, is laid waste, and the Gentiles have profaned it.

‖ Or, holy thing.

13 To what end therefore shall we live any longer?

14 Then Mattathias and his sons rent their clothes, and put on sackcloth, and mourned very sore.

Her temple is become as a man of no reputation:
Her glorious vessels are carried away captive:
Her young children are slain in the streets,
Her youths with the sword of the enemy.
What nation has not inherited part of her kingdom,
Nor gotten a portion of her spoils?
All her adornment hath been taken away from her;
Instead of a free woman, she is become a bond slave.
Behold, our sanctuary, even our beauty and our glory, is laid waste;
The nations have profaned it. Wherefore do we still live?"

6. when he saw.] "He" refers to Mattathias, the chief subject of the first section.

blasphemies.] Impious deeds, rather than impious words, seem to be intended. (Comp. ch. i. 35–63.) Deeds alone could be seen.

in Juda and Jerusalem.] I.e. "in Judæa, and especially in Jerusalem."

7. wherefore was I born to see this misery?] Rather, "Wherefore was I born for this, to see the misery," &c.? The sentiment may be compared with that of Job iii. 3–11, and Jeremiah xx. 14–18. A heathen poet went so far as to say that it would have been better for every man not to have been born (Soph. 'Œd. Col.' l. 1225).

9. Her glorious vessels.] Comp. ch. i. 21–23; and note the stress that is laid on the capture of the "vessels" belonging to the earlier temple in the canonical Books of the Old Testament (2 Kings xxv. 14–17; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 7; Jer. lii. 17–23; Dan. i. 2, v. 2; Ezra i. 7, &c.).

her infants are slain.] See ch. i. 61; 2 Macc. vi. 10.

her young men with the sword.] See 2 Macc. v. 24.

10. What nation hath not had a part?] The thought of the poet goes back, perhaps, from the present to the past, and shows him Judæa as the prey of a long succession of nations—Egyptians (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26), Assyrians (2 Kings xviii. 13–16; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11–13), Babylonians (2 Kings xxiv. 1; xxv. 1–21), Syrians (ib. xvi. 5, 6), Moabites (ib. xxiv. 2), Ammonites (ib.), Persians (Ezra ix. 9), Greco-Macedonians—who had all robbed her, more or less, of her sovereignty, and been partakers of her spoils. Or, perhaps, he only means that the armed force which Antiochus employed to carry out his measures was drawn from all the various nations under his dominion (comp. 2 Macc. viii. 9), and that in this way there was scarcely a people which had not profited by the spoliation of Jerusalem (ch. i. 35). In either case, his language is rhetorical, and not to be pressed to the letter.

11. of a free woman she is become a bondslave.] Judæa lost her independence at the time of the Babylonish Captivity, and only recovered it through the efforts of the Maccabee princes. She was subject to Babylon from B.C. 606 to B.C. 538; to Persia from B.C. 538 to B.C. 332; and to the Greco-Macedonians from B.C. 332 to B.C. 168, when Mattathias revolted. But the poet ignores the fact of political subjection, and considers that, so long as she was allowed the free exercise of her religion, she was free.

12. our sanctuary . . . is laid waste.] Rather, "is waste," "is desolate"—i.e. has none to worship in it. There had as yet been no damage done to the Temple building. Compare note on ch. i. 39.

the Gentiles have profaned it.] See ch. i. 54, 59.

14. rent their clothes and put on sackcloth.] These were usual signs of mourning in the East, and were not peculiar to the Jews.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

15 In the mean while the king's officers, such as compelled the people to revolt, came into the city Modin, to make them sacrifice.

16 And when many of Israel came unto them, Mattathias also and his sons came together.

17 Then answered the king's officers, and said to Mattathias on this wise, Thou art a ruler, and an honourable and great man in this city, and strengthened with sons and brethren:

B. C. cir. 167.

18 Now therefore come thou first, and fulfil the king's commandment, like as all the heathen have done, yea, and the men of Juda also, and such as remain at Jerusalem: so shalt thou and thy house be in the number of the king's friends, and thou and thy

(See Diod. Sic. i. 72; Herod. viii. 99; Jonah iii. 6, 8; Job i. 20, ii. 12, &c.)

§ 3. THE CIRCUMSTANCES UNDER WHICH MATTATHIAS BEGAN THE REVOLT.

15-28. Mattathias and his sons had withdrawn from Jerusalem, when the persecution grew hot there, and retired to their ancestral city, or village, on the verge of the Shefelah, or great Philistine plain, where they may have expected that they would be unmolested. But, after a short pause, the persecutors spread themselves from the capital over the country. The "king's officers"—probably the "overseers" of ch. i. 51—appeared at Modeïn, and required submission to the royal edict on the part of its inhabitants. As Mattathias was the chief man of the place, and had attended the first meeting which the officer summoned, he was called upon first and foremost to obey the edict and sacrifice. This, in the name of himself, his sons, and his brethren, he solemnly refused to do. As he ceased speaking, one of the Hellenizing party presented himself before the commissioner, and signified his desire to do what Mattathias would not. Mattathias at once slew him, and followed up his bold act by also killing the commissioner and destroying the idol altar. He then went through the city, and summoned all who were zealous for the law to follow him; after which, with his followers, he quitted the city, and betook himself to the mountains. Thus was open war declared between the small band of faithful Jews and the mighty Antiochus.

15. In the mean while.] There is no such expression in the original. Probably some weeks intervened between the "mourning" of Mattathias and the arrival of the officers.

the king's officers.] Literally, "the men from the king"—i.e. those whom he had commissioned for the purpose of carrying out his orders.

such as compelled the people to revolt.] Rather, "to apostatize." The "revolt" intended is rebellion against the laws of God.

to make them sacrifice.] Comp. i. 51.

16. Mattathias . . . and his sons came together.] No doubt the inhabitants generally were summoned to appear before the commissioner. Mattathias and his sons came, since it was not for them to anticipate what he was about to say to them. He might have come upon some harmless errand.

17. answered . . . and said.] Rather, "took the word, and said." The expression is used by the LXX. of opening speeches, without any reference to anything said, or even thought, by the opposite party. See below, ch. viii. 19.

Thou art a ruler.] In the East every petty town and village has its "head-men," who represent it with the government, apportion its taxes, collect them, and otherwise act as its chiefs. Mattathias held such a position at Modeïn, probably from his birth and wealth, not from his priestly character.

an honourable and great man.] Not only a ruler, but one of good repute, and a "great man" compared with the rest of the inhabitants; as Ewald says, "the most important personage of the place."

18. like as all the heathen have done.] See note on ch. i. 42.

such as remain at Jerusulem.] An acknowledgment that great numbers had refused to remain, and had left the capital. (See ch. i. 38.)

so shalt thou and thy house be in the number of the king's friends.] Something more is meant than a promise that they should be accounted loyal subjects. The Persian kings had their "Royal Benefactors," who formed a distinct class (Herod. iii. 140; viii. 85), were known as Orosangs, and had probably special privileges. Alexander had his "companions," who were a definite privileged class. The Syro-Macedonian kings seem to have distinguished two classes of persons, one as their "companions," and another as their "friends" (Polyb. xxxi. 3, § 7), and to have permitted to each certain distinctions of dress, precedence, and the like. Mattathias and his sons were offered admission into the class of "friends." (Comp. ch. x. 65.)

B. C. cir. 167. children shall be honoured with silver and gold, and many rewards.

19 Then Mattathias answered and spake with a loud voice, Though all the nations that are under the king's dominion obey him, and fall away every one from the religion of their fathers, and give consent to his commandments:

[c] Josh. 24. 15. 20 [c] Yet will I and my sons and my brethren walk in the covenant of our fathers.

21 God forbid that we should forsake the law and the ordinances.

22 We will not hearken to the king's words, to go from our religion, either on the right hand, or the left. B. C. cir. 167.

23 Now when he had left speaking these words, there came one of the Jews in the sight of all to sacrifice on the altar which was at Modin, according to the king's commandment.

24 Which thing when Mattathias saw, he was inflamed with zeal, and his reins trembled, neither could he forbear to shew his anger according to judgment: wherefore he ran, and slew him upon the altar.

25 Also the king's commissioner, who compelled men to sacrifice, he honoured with silver and gold.] Gifts of ornaments in the precious metals had been bestowed upon their courtiers by the Persian kings from time immemorial (Xen. 'Cyrop.' viii. 2, §§ 7–12). The practice passed from them to the Syro-Macedonians. (See below, ch. x. 20, 89.)

19. with a loud voice.] To attract attention. Mattathias desired that his fellow-townsmen should hear him.

Though all the nations.] Mattathias does not question the statement made to him (v. 18), that "all the heathen have done according to the king's commandment." True or false, it is the same to him. He will not "follow a multitude to evil" (Ex. xxiii. 2). Though all the world should fall away, yet will he be faithful, and his father's house. His boast was better kept than that of St. Peter (Matt. xxvi. 33).

under the king's dominion.] Literally, "in the house of the king's kingdom."

20. the covenant of our fathers.] I.e. the covenant (or agreement) which God made with our ancestors at Mount Sinai (Ex. xix. 8; xxiv. 3–8).

22. either on the right hand, or the left.] Comp. Deut. v. 32; xvii. 20; xxviii. 14.

23. when he had left speaking.] Rather, "as he left speaking."

there came.] Or, "there approached." The man seems to have come up casually, not having been among those assembled at the first (v. 16), and so not having heard the indignant protest of Mattathias. He was no doubt a zealous Hellenizer, anxious to gain favour with the authorities by coming forward among the first. His example, if Mattathias had done nothing, might have had a most demoralising effect.

24. his reins trembled.] Comp. Ps. lxxiii. 21, "I was pricked in my reins:" and see also Job xvi. 13, xix. 27; Ps. vii. 9; Lam. iii. 13. The Hebrew physiology connected that inward emotion which stirs men, and forces them to sudden act, as much with the "reins" (i.e. kidneys) as with the heart. Hence the two are constantly joined together (Ps. vii. 9, xxvi. 2; Jer. xi. 20, xvii. 10, xx. 12; Rev. ii. 23).

neither could he forbear to shew his anger.] Rather, "and he poured forth his anger"—did not restrain it—gave it free vent.

according to judgment.] Or, "to condemnation." In his fury he judged and condemned the man, accounting him worthy of death, either from a natural impulse, or perhaps with conscious reference to the command given in the Law (Ex. xxii. 20; Deut. xiii. 6–9, &c.), that idolaters should be killed without pity. Jewish opinion would entirely approve of such an execution without formal trial or sentence, when the sinner was caught in the act and there could be no doubt of his guilt. (Comp. Ex. xxxii. 27, 28; Num. xxv. 8; 1 Kings xviii. 40; 2 Kings x. 25, xxiii. 25, &c.)

he ran.] His haste shewed his zeal.

upon the altar.] In the very act of sacrificing (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 25). Josephus says that Mattathias, and his sons, rushed upon the man, armed with broad knives (κοπίδες), and slew him; but probably he draws upon his imagination for these additional facts.

25. the king's commissioner.] Josephus calls him "the king's general," and gives his name as Apelles. The Law did not require this act, since the commissioner was a heathen, engaged in executing the orders of his legitimate sovereign. It must be justified, if justified at all, as an act of warfare, one by killed at that time, and the altar he pulled down. B. C. cir. 167.

Digitized by Microsoft®

26 Thus dealt he zealously for the law of God, like as [d] Phinees did unto Zambri the son of Salom. [d] Numb. 25. 7 8.

27 And Mattathias cried throughout the city with a loud voice, saying, Whosoever is zealous of the law, and maintaineth the covenant, let him follow me.

28 So he and his sons fled into the mountains, and left all that ever they had in the city. B. C. cir. 167

29 Then many that sought after justice and judgment went down into the wilderness, to ‖dwell there: ‖ Gr. sit, or, abide.

30 Both they, and their children, and their wives, and their cattle; because ‖afflictions increased sore upon them. ‖ Gr. evils were multiplied upon them.

which Mattathias consummated, and proclaimed, his rebellion.

the altar he pulled down.] In accordance with the commands given in Ex. xxxiv. 13 and Deut. xii. 3, and after the example of the best kings (2 Kings xviii. 4; xxiii. 13–20). An idolatrous altar was a pollution to the holy land.

26. like as Phinees did unto Zambri.] The reference is to Numb. xxv. 7, 8, where the act of Phinehas (Gk. Phinees) is recorded. Phinehas, like Mattathias, had executed divine vengeance on two persons, an Israelite, and a heathen who was partaker in his offence. His "zeal" received the approval of God (ibid. vv. 11–13; Ps. cvi. 30, 31).

27. maintaineth the covenant.] Literally, "maintaineth covenant"—i.e. keeps faith with God. The covenant was entered into by circumcision, and involved a keeping of all the commandments. Mattathias' appeal was intended to rally to him all who were prepared to maintain their religion against the attempt of the king to put it down.

let him follow me.] Mattathias knew that it would be impossible to resist the force that Antiochus had at his command in a petty town like Modeïn, which was perhaps not even walled. His plan was to withdraw, with such support as he could obtain, into the wildest part of the hill-country of Judæa, where David had so long resisted Saul, and thence to carry on a guerilla warfare against the persecuting king. His success is related in the next section.

§ 4. The War of Independence, as conducted by Mattathias himself.

29–48. At first there was a great want of unity and cohesion among the religious party. They fled to the wilderness in small and separate bodies, as persecution pressed upon them, without any one acknowledged leader, without even any generally accepted plan of defence. They were scattered over a wide extent of country, and it was no doubt difficult for the chief men to meet and consult together. When the war began by the forces of Antiochus entering the hill-country and requiring the submission of the fugitives, it had not even been determined what course was to be pursued with respect to the observance of the sabbath, whether or no the rest commanded was to be regarded as involving a complete suspension of military operations on that day. Among the first of the patriots attacked were some who took the strictest possible view, and felt bound to offer no resistance at all to the enemy on the day of rest. The consequence was at least one serious disaster, involving the loss of a thousand lives (v. 38). After this, Mattathias, and those under his immediate command, resolved to take the opposite course, and defend themselves on the sabbath to the utmost of their power, if attacked. Success followed this change of tactics. The scattered bands of fugitives rallied to the leader whose courage and strong sense seemed to promise victory (v. 43). The secret adherents of true religion in Jerusalem and other places held by the Syro-Macedonians came flocking in (v. 42). Mattathias was able to take the offensive. In many places he and his adherents overthrew the idolatrous altars, drove the apostates away, and re-established the old Jewish customs and usages. The Syro-Macedonians seem to have been afraid to meet him in the field, and to have on certain occasions retreated from his pursuit (v. 47).

29. many that sought after justice and judgment.] I.e. many who were not content to live under the detestable rule of the Syro-Macedonians, by whom the principles of justice were daily outraged, to their constant loss and hurt. (See the next verse.)

30. their cattle.] The highlands of Palestine can always afford nourishment to a considerable number of cattle; and all the tribes by whom they have been possessed have always been rich in cattle, as the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 9), the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 9; xxx. 20), the Moabites (2 Kings iii. 4), and others. Jerome says that about Tekoah "there was no village, not even rustic cottages, nor, on account of the dryness and sandiness, were any crops raised; but the

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

31 Now when it was told the king's servants, and [e] the host that was at Jerusalem, in the city of David, that certain men, who had broken the king's commandment, were gone down into [f] the secret places in the wilderness,

[e] ch. 1. 33, 34.

[f] ch. 1. 53.

32 They pursued after them a great number, and having overtaken them, they camped against them, and made war against them on the sabbath day.

33 And they said unto them, Let that which ye have done hitherto suffice; come forth, and do according to the commandment of the king, and ye shall live.

B. C. cir. 167.

34 But they said, We will not come forth, neither will we do [g] the king's commandment, to profane the sabbath day.

[g] ch. 1. 45.

35 So then they gave ‖them the battle with all speed.

‖ Or, the Jews.

36 Howbeit they answered them not, neither cast they a stone at them, nor stopped the places where they lay hid;

37 But said, Let us die all in our ‖innocency: heaven and earth shall whole district was full of herdsmen" ('Proleg. in Amos'). Comp. Luke ii. 8.

‖ Gr. simplicity.

afflictions.] I.e. ill-treatment at the hands of the Syro-Macedonians.

31. the king's servants.] Literally, "the king's men"—i.e. the men placed in authority by the king, to uphold his interests and govern the country—the civil authorities of the land.

the host.] The armed force, placed at the disposal of the civil authorities.

that was at Jerusalem, in the city of David.] Rather, "that was in Jerusalem, the city of David." The two are not distinguished, but identified, according to the existing text. It is conjectured, however, that either "Jerusalem" is a gloss which has crept into the text from the margin, or else that the preposition ἐν has fallen out after "Jerusalem." In the latter case our translation would give the true meaning, and "the city of David" would be the part of Jerusalem which was occupied by the Syro-Macedonian garrison. (Comp. ch. i. 35.)

the king's commandment.] See ch. i. 44–50.

secret places.] See note on ch. i. 53.

32. made war against them.] I.e. attacked them. No doubt it was known to the Syro-Macedonians, or at any rate suspected by them, that, in their zeal for the Law, the insurgents would feel bound by its letter, and would offer no resistance upon the sabbath. Such an interpretation of the Fourth Commandment was not unnatural in a time of high religious excitement; but it does not appear to have suggested itself to any mind prior to the Captivity.

33. they said unto them.] The offer was an amnesty for the past, on condition that the fugitives returned to their several cities or villages, and submitted themselves to the royal decrees—perhaps not bad terms, humanly speaking, under the circumstances.

34. But they said.] The terms offered were utterly rejected. "We will not come forth," they said. We refuse to quit our refuge, dry and arid region though it be, since we are not prepared to obey the king's decrees. On the contrary, we are resolved to disobey them. Resistance to the civil authority, when its commands are contrary to the law of God, is the duty of every religious man, and is frequently commended in Holy Scripture. (See Dan. iii. 18–30, vi. 10–26; Acts iv. 19, 20, v. 29, 30, &c.)

to profane the sabbath day.] Comp. ch. i. 45. As the text stands, this can only refer to the royal command issued to all Jews, to profane the sabbath. It is suspected, however, that in the original Hebrew the words were—"neither will we profane the sabbath;" i.e. by fighting. There certainly seems to be no reason for the selection of the one point of sabbath profanation out of the many included in the royal decree (ch. i. 44–49).

35. with all speed.] Lest they should change their minds, and resolve to resist.

36. they answered them not.] They made no response to the attack—took no steps to meet it, but remained absolutely inactive.

neither cast they a stone at them.] The sling was at all times one of the main weapons employed by the Israelites (Judg. xx. 16; 1 Sam. xvii. 40; 2 Kings iii. 25; 1 Chr. xii. 2), and was especially suited for an extemporised army of shepherds (v. 30) and townsmen.

nor stopped the places where they lay hid.] They would not even block the passes by which their hiding-places had to be approached.

37. Let us die . . . in our innocency.] Literally, "in our simplicity."

heaven and earth shall testify.] Rather, "are witness." The remonstrance had no

B. C. cir. 167. testify for us, that ye put us to death wrongfully.

38 So they rose up against them in battle on the sabbath, and they slew them, with their wives and children, and their cattle, to the number of a thousand ‖ people.

‖ Gr. souls of men.

39 Now when Mattathias and his friends understood hereof, they mourned for them right sore.

40 And one of them said to another, If we all do as our brethren have done, and fight not for our lives and laws against the heathen, they will now quickly root us out of the earth.

B. C. cir. 167. 41 At that time therefore they decreed, saying, Whosoever shall come to make battle with us on the sabbath day, we will fight against him; neither will we die all, [h] as our brethren that were murdered in the secret places.

[h] ver. 38.

42 Then came there unto him a company of Assideans, who were mighty men of Israel, even all such as were voluntarily devoted unto the law.

43 Also all they that fled for persecution joined themselves unto them, and were a stay unto them.

effect. In spite of it the Syro-Macedonians fell upon them, and slew every soul—men, women, and children. Not even were the cattle spared. (See the next verse.)

39. when Mattathias and his friends understood hereof.] It is evident that the disaster occurred to a body of patriots not under the command of Mattathias. Probably there were many such bodies scattered over the length and breadth of the hill region, fugitives from various parts of Judæa, as yet without concert or even knowledge of each other. Each such band followed its own views of what was right.

40. one of them said to another.] The intelligence received set men thinking what was the proper course to pursue. There was no established practice, since the Jews had remained at peace during the whole period of the Persian dominion (B.C. 536–332), and had submitted to Alexander without offering any resistance (Joseph., 'Ant. Jud.,' xi. 8, § 5). What the rule had been in the old wars was forgotten. We can scarcely suppose it to have forbidden resistance to an attack.

41. they decreed.] Or "resolved." The form used expresses a resolve taken after deliberation. We must suppose a council to have been held among the chiefs, the question to have been debated, and a decision reached. But the decision was scarcely a "decree."

Whosoever shall come . . . we will fight against him.] The line taken seems to have been that it was lawful to stand on the defensive and resist attack, but not to take the offensive, upon the sabbath. The same course was pursued in the first Roman war (Joseph., 'Ant. Jud.,' xiv. 4, § 3), with the worst results, since the Romans pushed forward their works, drove mines under walls, and in all respects took advantage of their enemies' inactivity upon the sabbath. The Syro-Macedonian strategy appears to have been inferior, and the Jews to have lost little by their resolution.

that were murdered.] Rather, "killed." The Syrians are not reproached for the advantage which they took of their adversaries' scrupulosity.

in the secret places.] Josephus speaks of caves, which certainly abound in the region (1 Sam. xxii. 1; xxiv. 3, &c.), and says that the Syro-Macedonians heaped brushwood against the mouths of the caves, and set it on fire, thus burning or suffocating the inmates ('Ant. Jud.,' xii. 6, § 2). Such a thing has often been done in savage, and even in civilised warfare; but there would seem to have been no necessity for it on the present occasion, since the Israelites offered no resistance.

42. unto him.] Rather, "unto them." a company of Assideans.] This is probably the true reading, instead of the "Judæans" of some MSS. "Assideans" (or rather, "Asidæans"—Ἀσιδαῖοι) is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Khăsidim, "pious ones"—a name assumed by a section of the religious Jews at this period. (Comp. ch. vii. 13 and 2 Macc. xiv. 6.) The sect seems to have been formed quite independently of the Maccabee family, and to have held more rigid views. Under the circumstances, however, they agreed to a coalition.

43. all they that fled for persecution.] The Asidæans were a religious party, spread throughout the whole land. They sent a contingent of warriors. The persons now spoken of were casual refugees, driven to quit their homes and take refuge in the wilderness by the actual pressure of persecution. They joined Mattathias en masse.

B. C. cir. 167.

44 So they joined their forces, and smote sinful men in their anger, and wicked men in their wrath: but the rest fled to the heathen for succour.

45 Then Mattathias and his friends went round about, and pulled down the altars:

46 And what children soever they found within the coast of Israel uncircumcised, those they circumcised ‖ Or, by force. ‖valiantly.

47 They pursued also after the proud men, and the work prospered in their hand. B. C. cir. 167.

48 So they recovered the law out of the hand of the Gentiles, and out of the hand of kings, neither ‖suffered they the sinner to triumph. ‖ Gr. gave the horn to the sinner.

49 Now when the time drew near cir. 166. that Mattathias should die, he said unto his sons, Now hath pride and rebuke gotten strength, and the time of destruction, and the wrath of indignation:

44. they joined their forces.] Rather, "they formed an army." The refugees were now numerous enough, and bold enough, to levy an army out of their number, and with it to assume the offensive. Their first attacks were directed against the "sinful" and "wicked"—i.e. against such of their own nation as had conformed to the state religion. They attacked outlying Jewish communities of this character, and "smote" them with the sword, regarding them as at once their enemies, and deserving of death for their apostasy. Such as escaped on occasion of these attacks fled to places where the Syro-Macedonians were in force, and could protect them.

for succour.] Rather, "to save themselves."

45. pulled down the altars.] I.e. the idol-altars which had been set up in the several villages and towns, as at Modeïn (v. 23).

46. children . . . uncircumcised.] See above, ch. i. 48.

47. They pursued also after the proud men.] By the "proud men" (υἱοὺς τῆς ὑπερηφανίας) the Syro-Macedonians are clearly intended. Not content with punishing their own apostates, and driving them from their homes (v. 44), the party of Mattathias had occasional encounters with the Syro-Macedonian oppressors, put them to flight, and "pursued" them.

the work prospered.] Literally, "the work was put in a right way"—i.e. a good commencement was made. It was only needful that the resistance should be carried on in the same spirit for success to be assured.

48. they recovered the law.] The Law is regarded as captured and enslaved by the Syro-Macedonians, from whom Mattathias and his followers rescued it.

out of the hand of kings.] Literally, "out of the hand of the kings." The officers of Antiochus, who carried out his will in the provinces, are viewed as "kings" in a certain sense, since they shared in the royal authority.

neither suffered they the sinner to triumph.] I.e. "they prevented the Hellenizers among the Jews from succeeding in their attempts." (See above, v. 44.)

§ 5. The Last Words of Mattathias, and his Death.

49-70. It appears from v. 70, that Mattathias continued at the head of the patriotic movement only for about a year. He was, no doubt, far advanced in years when the persecution broke out, and the hardships of warfare and of a desert life would tell upon him more than upon younger men. In the course of the first year of the war he found his end approaching, and felt that it devolved on him to make arrangements for the future. Accordingly, he called his sons together, and made them the speech recorded in vv. 49-68, exhorting them to faithfulness by the examples of the men of old time, and appointing his son Simon as chief counsellor and ruler, his son Judas as captain. After this he blessed all his sons, and so died. He was buried by his sons at Modeïn, which was one of the places already recovered (vv. 45-48), in the sepulchre of his fathers.

49. when the time drew near that Mattathias should die.] The form of expression implies a natural death in a ripe old age. (Comp. Gen. xlvii. 29; 1 Kings ii. 1.)

he said unto his sons.] The second address of Mattathias has not the rhythmic perfection of the first. Still, it is cast in a poetic mould; and a balance of clauses may be traced throughout. We can scarcely suppose that either speech does more than follow the general outline of what Mattathias said.

Now hath pride and rebuke gotten strength.] The "pride" is that of the Syro-Macedonians, who (in v. 47) are called "sons of pride." The "rebuke" is that to which the people of God were exposed at the hand of scoffers.

the time of destruction and the wrath of

B. C. cir. 166.

50 Now therefore, my sons, be ye zealous for the law, and give your lives for the covenant of your fathers.

51 Call to remembrance what acts our fathers did in their ‖ time; so shall ye receive great honour and an everlasting name.

‖ Gr. generations.

[i] Gen. 22. 9. 10. Rom. 4. 3. Jam. 2. 21, 22, 23.

52 [i] Was not Abraham found faithful in temptation, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness?

[k] Gen. 41. 40.

53 [k] Joseph in the time of his distress kept the commandment, and was made lord of Egypt.

B. C. cir. 156.

54 [l] Phinees our father in being zealous and fervent obtained the covenant of an everlasting priesthood.

[l] Numb. 25. 13. Ecclus. 45 23, 24.

55 [m] Jesus for fulfilling the word was made a judge in Israel.

[m] Josh. 1. 2.

56 [n] Caleb for bearing witness before the congregation received the heritage of the land.

[n] Numb. 14. 6, 7, 24 Josh. 14. 9, 13.

57 [o] David for being merciful possessed the throne of an everlasting kingdom.

[o] 2 Sam. 2 4. & 7. 16

58 [p] Elias for being zealous and indignation.] Rather, "a time of destruction and a passion of rage."

[p] 2 Kings 2. 11.

50. be ye zealous for the law.] The commendation of "zeal for the law," which marks the Maccabee period (ch. ii. 24, 26, 27, 54, 58), led ultimately to the formation of the sect of "zelots," which so greatly distinguished itself in the last siege of Jerusalem, and of which the apostle, Simon Zelotes, was a member (Luke vi. 15).

the covenant of your fathers.] See note on v. 20.

51. in their time.] Literally, "in their generations."

so shall ye receive great honour and an everlasting name.] Greek ideas had to a considerable extent leavened the whole mass of the Jewish nation, even the most religious. In the old times the Jews did not fight for their own honour, or to "get them a name," but for God's glory, that His name might be held in honour, and His might shewn forth to the heathen. But now it was different. The low motive of personal ambition and desire of posthumous fame was allowed to influence conduct, and is continually mentioned as the predominant incentive to great deeds and exploits. (See below, ch. v. 57, vi. 44, ix. 10, xiv. 29; 2 Macc. vi. 23, &c.)

52. Was not Abraham found faithful in temptation.] I.e. when tried whether he would be willing to sacrifice Isaac or no. (Gen. xxii. 1–12; Heb. xi. 17; Ecclus. xliv. 20.)

it was imputed unto him for righteousness.] The words are an exact quotation from the Septuagint version of Gen. xv. 6. (So St. James in his epistle, ch. ii. 23; and St. Paul in Rom. iv. 3, Gal. iii. 6.) "Reckoned," or "counted," is, on the whole, a better rendering of the original than "imputed." (See the Revised Version.)

53. Joseph . . . kept the commandment.] See Gen. xxxix. 7–12.

54. Phinees our father.] Mattathias means to claim descent from Phinehas, who at any rate was of the same tribe with him and his sons. On the great deed which distinguished Phinehas, see note on v. 26. On his obtaining, in reward for his deed, "the covenant of an everlasting priesthood," see Num. xxv. 13; and comp. Ecclus. xlv. 24.

55. Jesus for fulfilling the word was made a judge.] Joshua received his appointment on account of his general obedience to God's word, not on account of any single act. He was "a man in whom was the spirit" (Num. xxvii. 18), and had fulfilled every duty laid upon him up to the time of his appointment. (See Ex. xvii. 10–13, xxiv. 13, xxxii. 17, xxxiii. 11; Num. xiv. 6–9.)

56. Caleb for bearing witness before the congregation.] Caleb was joined with Joshua in one of his righteous acts. Like Joshua, he gave a true report of the land of Canaan and its inhabitants after being sent to spy it out. This was the "witness" which he bore "before the congregation" (Num. xiv. 6–9), and for bearing it he ran a near risk of being stoned.

received the heritage of the land.] I.e. was allowed to enter the holy land (Num. xiv. 30–38), and given a heritage in it (Josh. xiv. 13).

57. David for being merciful.] The mercifulness of David is not elsewhere commended; but it is to be remembered that he twice spared Saul's life when he might have taken it (1 Sam. xxiv. 4–11; xxvi. 5–12), and also allowed Shimei to live, notwithstanding that he had cursed him (2 Sam. xix. 23; 1 Kings ii. 8).

possessed the throne of an everlasting kingdom.] For the promise made to him of such a kingdom, see 2 Sam. vii. 13, 16. The continuance of the temporal kingdom was conditional (Ps. cxxxii. 12), and ultimately the promise was so far forfeited. But the spiritual kingdom remains in the line of David for ever and ever through the eternity of the kingdom of Christ.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166. fervent for the law was taken up into heaven.

[q] Dan. 3. 16, 17, 18, 26. 59 [q]Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, by believing were saved out of the flame.

[r] Dan. 6. 22. 60 [r]Daniel for his innocency was delivered from the mouth of lions.

61 And thus consider ye throughout all ages, that none that put their trust in him shall be overcome.

62 Fear not then the words of a sinful man: for his glory shall be dung and worms.

63 To day he shall be lifted up, and to morrow he shall not be found, because he is [s]returned into his dust, and his thought is come to nothing.

B. C. cir. 166. [s] Gen. 3. 19. Ps. 146. 4

64 Wherefore, ye my sons, be valiant, and shew yourselves men in the behalf of the law; for by it shall ye obtain glory.

65 And, behold, I know that your brother Simon is a man of counsel, give ear unto him alway: he shall be a father unto you.

66 As for Judas Maccabeus, he hath been mighty and strong, even

58. Elias for being zealous and fervent for the law.] Comp. 1 Kings xviii. 19–40, xix. 10, xxi. 20–24; 2 Kings i. 3–12.

was taken up into heaven.] See 2 Kings ii. 11, and comp. Ecclus. xlviii. 9.

59. Ananias, Azarias, and Misael.] See Dan. i. 6–19; ii. 17, 49; iii. 12–30. The occurrence of these names, and the simplicity and brevity of the statement, that they "were saved out of the flame"—so closely parallel to the antecedent statements with respect to Abraham, Joseph, Phinehas, Joshua, Caleb, David, and Elijah—is strong evidence that the Book of Daniel was received into the Canon at the time when this work was written—nay, at the time of Mattathias' death. His dying words were tolerably sure to have been remembered; and their recorder would have shrunk from interpolating into them a passage which, if Daniel were a historical romance, written in the thick of the struggle, his contemporaries would have known that Mattathias could not have uttered.

by believing were saved.] See Dan. iii. 17. They believed that they would be saved; and their faith gave them the strength which carried them through the terrible ordeal.

60. Daniel for his innocency was delivered.] The reference to Dan. vi. 22 is palpable, though the Greek word translated "innocency" is different in the two passages.

61. throughout all ages.] Literally, "from generation to generation."

shall be overcome.] Rather, "shall fail," or "be without strength."

62. the words of a sinful man.] The "sinful man" especially glanced at is Antiochus, and the "words" are those of his decrees; but the warning passes beyond the particular case to all others resembling it. The words of those who can do no more than "kill the body" are at no time to be "feared" when they run counter to the commandments of God.

his glory shall be dung and worms.] I.e. "shall rot and perish." There is no allusion to the "worms" which "rose up out of the body" of Antiochus (2 Macc. ix. 9).

63. his thought.] Literally, "his calculations," i.e. the expectations that he formed of the results which he was about to accomplish. Comp. Ps. cxlvi. 4, where the LXX. use the same word—διαλογισμοί.

64. be valiant and shew yourselves men.] Comp. Josh. i. 9; x. 25.

shall ye obtain glory.] See note on v. 51.

65. your brother Simon is a man of counsel.] In the Greek, it is "Simeon" here, though elsewhere always "Simon" (ch. ii. 3; xii. 33, 38; xiii.–xvi. passim). He appears to have been the least warlike of the five brethren, and was not made "captain" till the other four were dead (ch. xiii. 8, 9). We do not hear of his advice being sought by the others during their terms of office; but his own conduct of affairs is remarkable for the preference shewn to prudent management over brute force (ch. xiii. 33, 47, 50; xiv. 10, 24; xv. 26).

a father.] Grimm explains this as "patriarchal chief," or "head of the family." But it is unnecessary to suppose that John, the eldest son (v. 2), was deposed from this position. "Father" means here, rather, "counsellor and guide."

66. Judas Maccabeus.] His surname evidently attached to Judas with peculiar closeness (comp. ch. iii. 1, and 2 Macc. v. 27), so that even his father called him by it. On its meaning, see note on v. 4.

mighty and strong.] Literally, "mighty in strength." The author of the Second Book of Maccabees seems to consider that Judas took a prominent part in the original withdrawal of the patriots into the wilderness from his youth up: let him be your captain, and ‖fight the battle of the people.

B. C. cir. 166.

‖ Or, fight ye the battle of the people.

67 Take also unto you all those that observe the law, and avenge ye the wrong of your people.

68 Recompense fully the heathen, and take heed to the commandments of the law.

69 So he blessed them, and was gathered to his fathers.

166. 70 And he died in the hundred forty and sixth year, and his sons buried him in the sepulchres of his fathers at Modin, and all Israel made great lamentation for him.

CHAPTER III.

B. C. cir. 166.

1 The valour and fame of Judas Maccabeus. 10 He overthroweth the forces of Samaria and Syria. 27 Antiochus sendeth a great power against him. 44 He and his fall to fasting and prayer, 58 and are encouraged.

THEN his son Judas, called Maccabeus, rose up in his stead.

2 And all his brethren helped him, and so did all they that held with his father, and they fought with cheerfulness the battle of Israel.

3 So he gat his people great honour, and put on a breastplate as a giant, and girt his warlike harness about him, and he made battles, protecting the host with his sword.

(2 Macc. v. 27; viii. 1), being the military leader, rather than Mattathias, from the first. But he perhaps over-glorifies his hero.

of the people.] Rather, "of the peoples" —the Jews and the Syro-Macedonians.

69. he blessed them.] Compare the acts of Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 4–40), Jacob (ibid. xlix. 3–28), and Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 1–29).

was gathered to his fathers.] An ordinary phrase for dying among the Hebrews (Judg. ii. 10; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 28; Bel and the Dragon, v. 1; Acts xiii. 36), alternating with the still more usual one, "was gathered unto his people" (Gen. xxv. 8, 17, xxxv. 29; Num. xxiv. 26; Deut. xxxii. 50, &c.).

70. in the hundred forty and sixth year.] B.C. 167–6, the year after the persecution began (ch. i. 54).

at Modin.] Modeïn must, therefore, have been among the places recovered from the Syro-Macedonians during the lifetime of Mattathias. (See vv. 44–47.)

all Israel made great lamentation for him.] By "all Israel" we must understand all those who were in arms for their religion. On the lamentations usual at the deaths of great men, see Gen. l. 10; Deut. xxxiv. 8; 2 Sam. i. 12; 2 Chr. xxxv. 24, 25, &c.

CHAPTER III.

§ 1. General Account of Judas Maccabæus, his Character and Fame.

1–9. There can be no doubt that Judas was the most popular of the Maccabean heroes. As Dean Stanley says, "he became the Jewish ideal of 'the Happy Warrior.'" His appearance, his gestures, his voice, his character, were equally objects of admiration and of delightful remembrance. We see in the Second Book of Maccabees how entirely by some the whole glory of the revolt and deliverance was ascribed to him. His great fame rested principally on his recovery of Jerusalem and the Temple (ch. iv. 36–54; 2 Macc. x. 1–5); but other circumstances were not without an influence upon it. His commanding stature, like that of a giant of old time (v. 3), challenged the admiring regard of a people which set much store by physical strength. His battle-cry had a ring in it which caused it to be compared to a lion's roar (v. 4), and stirred the hearts of all who heard it. His long career of victory, scarcely chequered by a reverse until his defeat and death at Eleasa (ch. ix. 12–18), added to his reputation, and made the later scenes of the struggle seem tame by comparison. No exploit in the entire war was thought equal to the triumph over Nicanor (ch. vii. 31–49; 2 Macc. xv. 20–37). Hence Judas remained the great national hero so long as Judæa was an independent country; his life was written and re-written; and the name originally peculiar to him (1 Macc. ii. 4) prevailed and became the best-known title of the entire family, as the five extant books of 'Maccabees' sufficiently indicate.

2. all they that held with his father.] See ch. ii. 42–44. The union among all the patriots, established by Mattathias after the first disaster (ch. ii. 38), continued under Judas. All accepted him as leader cheerfully.

3. as a giant.] Some allusion to his personal appearance seems to be intended. Dean Stanley says, "His countrymen delighted to remember the stately appearance, as of an ancient giant, when he fastened on his breastplate" ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 306).

protecting the host.] Literally, "the camp;" but no doubt the host is intended.

with his sword.] On the sword of Judas,

B. C. cir. 166.

4 In his acts he was like a lion, and like a lion's whelp roaring for his prey.

5 For he pursued the wicked, and sought them out, and burnt up those that vexed his people.

6 Wherefore the wicked shrunk for fear of him, and all the workers of iniquity were troubled, because salvation prospered in his hand.

7 He grieved also many kings, and made Jacob glad with his acts, and his memorial is blessed for ever.

8 Moreover he went through the cities of Juda, destroying the ungodly out of them, and turning away wrath from Israel: B. C. cir. 166.

9 So that he was renowned unto the utmost part of the earth, and he ‖received unto him such as were ready to perish. ‖ Gr. gathered together.

10 Then Apollonius gathered the Gentiles together, and a great host out of Samaria, to fight against Israel.

11 Which thing when Judas per-see verse 12, and compare 2 Macc. xv. 15, 16.

4. In his acts he was like a lion.] Judah, Israel, and Gad are compared to lions in the Pentateuch (Gen. xlix. 9; Num. xxiv. 9; Deut. xxxiii. 20). Saul and Jonathan are said to have been "stronger than lions" (2 Sam. i. 23) by David. The metaphor is not common with the later Jewish writers, but is found, applied to Judas and his companions, in 2 Macc. xi. 11.

5. he pursued the wicked.] Literally, "the lawless ones," i.e. those who had cast aside the observance of the Law. (See ch. i. 43, 52; ch. ii. 23.)

burnt up those that vexed his people.] I.e. "consumed with fire the cities and strongholds of the Syro-Macedonians." (See below, ch. v. 5, 28, 35, &c.; and comp. 2 Macc. viii. 6, x. 36, &c.) Occasionally, the defenders were burnt with their strongholds (2 Macc. x. 36).

6. salvation prospered in his hand.] I.e. the work of shaking off the Syro-Macedonian tyranny, and rescuing the Jewish people from it, went on prosperously under his guidance.

7. He grieved also many kings.] Antiochus Epiphanes, Antiochus Eupator, and Demetrius Soter are especially intended; but the term "king" is probably used with some vagueness, as in ch. ii. 48.

his memorial is blessed for ever.] See note on ch. ii. 51.

9. he received unto him such as were ready to perish.] This has been supposed to point to a chivalrous readiness to receive and protect persons in extreme distress or danger (Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' l.s.c.); but it may be questioned whether more is meant than that he gathered to his standard, and united in one, the scattered Jews who were otherwise on the point of perishing. (Comp. ch. ii. 43, 44.)

§ 2. THE FIRST BATTLES OF JUDAS—HE DEFEATS APOLLONIUS AND SERON.

10–26. The force under the command of Judas amounted to six thousand warriors (2 Macc. viii. 1). With this he assumed the offensive, and beginning with night attacks (ib. verse 7), he took town after town from the enemy, enlarging his own borders and narrowing theirs. After a time, Apollonius, the "chief collector of tribute," who had made the assault on Jerusalem in B.C. 167 (supra, i. 29–32; 2 Macc. v. 24–26), and was apparently established as governor of Samaria, thought it incumbent on him to endeavour to put down the rebellion, and, having collected a large army, marched against Judas, who boldly met his attack half-way, defeated and slew him, and took his sword to be his own weapon (vv. 10–12). This futile effort was followed by the attempt of Seron, governor of Cœlesyria, who seems to have brought a very considerable force against the Jewish leader (vv. 15–19), and to have invaded the hill country in the neighbourhood of Beth-horon. He too was met and defeated, with the loss of 800 men, and his army was driven to take refuge in Philistia (vv. 23, 24). The military talent of Judas was sufficiently established by these two engagements, and his reputation spread far and wide (vv. 25, 26).

10. Apollonius.] Probably the same as the "chief collector of tribute" mentioned in ch. i. 29, whom the author of the Second Book calls "that detestable ringleader" (2 Macc. v. 24). Josephus calls him "commandant of Samaria" ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 5, § 5); and we may conclude that he exercised satrapial authority over that district.

gathered the Gentiles together, and a great host out of Samaria.] The army which he collected consisted in part of Syro-Macedonians ("Gentiles"), in part of Samaritans, always hostile to the Jews, and now especially estranged from them. For the history of the

B. C. cir. 166. ceived, he went forth to meet him, and so he smote him, and slew him: many also fell down slain, but the rest fled.

12 Wherefore Judas took their spoils, and Apollonius' sword also, and therewith he fought all his life long.

13 Now when Seron, a prince of the army of Syria, heard say that Judas had gathered unto him a multitude and company of the faithful to go out with him to war;

14 He said, I will get me a name and honour in the kingdom; for I will go fight with Judas and them that are with him, who despise the king's commandment. B. C. cir. 166.

15 So he made him ready to go up, and there went with him a mighty host of the ungodly to help him, and to be avenged of the children of Israel.

16 And when he came near to the going up of Bethhoron, Judas went enmity, see Ewald's 'History of Israel,' vol. v. pp. 213–222, E. T. Its germ may be found in the refusal of Zerubbabel to let the semi-heathen nation take part in the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezra iv. 2–4), its expansion in the circumstances connected with the establishment of Manasseh at Samaria as Samaritan high priest (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xi. 7, § 2 et seqq.), and its full development in the establishment of a rival Temple, with a rival "Law" and a rival worship, on Mount Gerizim soon after the conquest of the Persian empire by Alexander. The bitter feeling of the Jews against their neighbours shortly after this time is strongly indicated by the words of the Son of Sirach at the close of his book: "There be two manner of nations which my heart abhorreth, and the third is no nation:—they that sit on the mountain of Samaria, and they that dwell among the Philistines, and that foolish people that dwell in Sichem" (Ecclus. l. 25, 26).

11. Judas . . . went forth to meet him.] It was a part of the system of strategy adopted by Judas to take the offensive as much as possible. He never retreated before an enemy or avoided an engagement. Even when sought out by an aggressive foe, he always met him half-way. (See vv. 16, 23; and comp. ch. iv. 12, 29, 34; v. 3, 6, 39, &c.)

he slew him.] Not "with his own hand," as Scholz supposes, or the expression would have been different. All that is meant is, that Apollonius fell in the battle.

many fell down slain.] Or "were wounded to death," as the same phrase is rendered in ch. i. 18.

12. Judas took . . . Apollonius' sword.] Dean Stanley well compares David's use of the sword of Goliath (1 Sam. xxi. 9). It was one of the main disadvantages of the patriotic party that they were ill-armed (ch. iv. 6). The Jewish sword appears to have been a short straight weapon, like the Persian ('Ancient Monarchies,' vol. iv. p. 114), not much better than a dagger. The Macedonian sword was of the same shape, but probably longer and better tempered.

13. Seron.] Seron is not known as a Greek name. Perhaps it represents the Phœnician Hiram, which was sometimes rendered into Greek by Seirômus or Seirom (Herod. vii. 98).

a prince of the army of Syria.] Rather, "the commander of the army of Syria." Josephus calls him "the general of Cœlesyria"—i.e. the commander of the troops stationed in that province, which adjoined Palestine on the north. It would be the duty of such an officer, without special orders, to undertake the suppression of a rebellion in Judæa as soon as the governor of Samaria had made an attempt and failed.

a multitude and company of the faithful.] I.e. not an organised army, but a mere mob of untrained men; in contrast with the "mighty host" of v. 15.

14. who despise the king's commandment.] Literally, "who set at nought the word of the king." (Comp. ch. i. 62; ii. 19–22, 34.)

15. a mighty host of the ungodly.] I.e. "a powerful army of Syro-Macedonians"—probably all the troops stationed in the province, who may have amounted to some 10,000 or 12,000 men.

16. he came near to the going up of Bethhoron.] Rather, "they came near." The "going up of Beth-horon" was the ascent from the Philistine plain to the highland of Judæa, which led from the coast to Jerusalem by way of Lydda, Gimzo, the two Bethhorons, and Gibeon. Seron, like most invaders, had kept the low ground until he reached the enemy's country, when he had to make the ascent from the Shefelah to the highland. His route must have led him near Modeïn. It is thought to have been that followed by Sennacherib. (See note on Josh. x. 10 in the 'Speaker's Commentary on the Old Testament,' vol. ii. p. 49.)

Judas went forth to meet him.] See note forth to meet him with a small company:

B. C. cir. 166.

17 Who, when they saw the host coming to meet them, said unto Judas, How shall we be able, being so few, to fight against so great a multitude and so strong, seeing we are ready to faint with fasting all this day?

18 Unto whom Judas answered, [a] It is no hard matter for many to be shut up in the hands of a few; and with the God of heaven it is all one, to deliver with a great multitude, or a small company:

19 For the victory of battle standeth not in the multitude of an host; but strength cometh from heaven.

20 They come ‖against us ‖in much pride and iniquity to destroy us, and our wives and children, and to spoil us:

21 But we fight for our lives and our laws.

22 Wherefore the Lord himself will overthrow them before our face: and as for you, be ye not afraid of them.

23 Now as soon as he had left off speaking, he leapt suddenly upon them, and so Seron and his host was overthrown before him.

24 And they pursued them ‖from the going down of Bethhoron unto the plain, where were slain about eight hundred men of them; and

B. C. cir. 166.

‖ Or, unto us.

‖ Gr. in multitude of pride, or, envy and iniquity.

[a] 1 Sam. 14. 6. 2 Chron. 14. 11.

‖ Gr. in the going down.

on v. 11. The MSS. vary between "to meet him" and "to meet them."

with a small company.] Literally, "with a few out of many." Judas probably regarded the pass of Beth-horon as affording space for only a small number, and therefore occupied it with a small picked force.

17. when they saw the host coming to meet them.] The "little company" with Judas, posted at the head of the pass, would have a clear view of the "mighty host" of Seron as it ascended the long valley from the plain, and may be excused if it misdoubted its ability to resist so great a multitude. How it had happened that the men had been allowed to become "faint with fasting" we are not told, and can only conjecture. Perhaps Judas had expected Seron's troops to arrive earlier at the point where he designed to give them battle, and in this expectation had not encumbered himself with a commissariat.

18. It is no hard matter for many to be shut up in the hands of a few.] Or, "delivered into the hands of a few." (Comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 12, xxiv. 18; 2 Sam. xviii. 28.) God, that is, can with the greatest ease deliver many into the hands of a few, to be destroyed by them. This is a lesson constantly taught in the Old Testament (Judg. vii. 2–7; 1 Sam. xiv. 6–16; 2 Chr. xiv. 9–13, xx. 12–24), and is one for all time. Heaven is not always on the side of "big battalions."

with the God of heaven.] Several MSS. omit τοῦ θεοῦ—"the God;" and it is more consonant with the general practice of the author to omit the Holy Name than to express it. (See the Introduction, § 4.)

it is all one, to deliver with a great multitude, or a small company.] Comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 6, and 2 Chron. xiv. 11, where the sentiment is exactly the same, though the expressions slightly differ.

20. They come against us in much pride and iniquity.] Rather, "with great insolence and lawlessness." The proceedings of Antiochus were altogether contrary to the engagements which Alexander had made with the Jewish nation, and also with the understanding upon which they had transferred their allegiance from the Ptolemies to the Seleucidæ. This is perhaps the lawlessness (ἀνομία) intended. Or it may be the non-observance by the Syro-Macedonians of the ordinary laws of warfare among civilised nations, as indicated in the remainder of the verse. The Greeks did not commonly make war on "women and children."

22. the Lord himself will overthrow them.] Our translators supply the nominative, "the Lord;" which is not expressed in the original. The writer of the Book avoids, as much as possible, all mention of the Divine Name. (Compare the practice of the writer of Esther.)

23. he leapt suddenly upon them.] Those who hold a pass line its sides, concealing themselves. At a given signal they rise, and (as it were) "leap upon" the foe.

24. they pursued them from the going down of Beth-horon unto the plain.] Rather, "they pursued him along the going down of Beth-horon." The Jews hung upon the defeated enemy all along the descent into the Philistine plain, as their ancestors under Joshua had hung upon the defeated Canaanites (Josh. x. 10, 11), and as their descendants

B. C. cir. 166. the residue fled into the land of the Philistines.

25 Then began the fear of Judas and his brethren, and an exceeding great dread, to fall upon the nations round about them:

26 Insomuch as his fame came unto the king, and all nations talked of the battles of Judas.

27 Now when king Antiochus heard these things, he was full of indignation: wherefore he sent and gathered together all the forces of his realm, even a very strong army. B. C. cir. 166.

28 He opened also his treasure, and gave his soldiers pay for a year, commanding them to be ready ‖ whensoever he should need them. ‖ Gr. at every need.

29 Nevertheless, when he saw that the money of his treasures failed, and ‖ that the tributes in the country were small, because of the dissension ‖ Gr. that the collectors of tribute in the country were few.

in the great Roman war hung upon Cestius Gallus and his legionaries (Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' ii. 19). Under the circumstances, the slaughter of "eight hundred men" is less than we should have expected, and indicative of a retreat in tolerably good order, which at no time became a rout.

the land of the Philistines.] The low tract between the hill country of Judæa—known as the shefelah—was still in possession of the Philistines, but belonged to the Syrian king. Its strong cities afforded the defeated troops of Seron a safe refuge.

25. Then began the fear of Judas and his brethren.] Hitherto the revolt had been looked upon as a trouble and annoyance, but not as a danger. Now that Judas, with only a small portion of his forces, had defeated a large detachment of the Syrian army, it was recognised that the consequences might be of serious importance to the Syrian empire and its dependencies—"the nations round about them."

26. his fame came unto the king.] Antiochus came to hear of Judas by name, and to understand that the Jews were acting under his leadership.

all nations.] A usual hyperbole—meaning all the nations of that part of the world.

§ 3. ANTIOCHUS GOES TO PERSIA, LEAVING LYSIAS TO CONDUCT THE WAR AGAINST JUDAS.

27–37. The ill-success of Seron moved Antiochus to increased exertion. He levied his whole military force, consisting probably of above 100,000 men, and gave them a year's pay in advance, perhaps to quiet apprehensions, which may have existed, that pay would not be forthcoming. He then found his treasury exhausted; and, as the tributes of some provinces were unpaid, he resolved to divide his troops, and proceed with one half of them to the eastern portion of the empire, for the purpose of collecting the arrears due to him there, leaving the other half under the command of a general named Lysias, to conduct the war against the Jews. Lysias was instructed to invade Judæa in force, and crush the rebellion by killing, or selling for slaves, the entire Jewish nation, after which he was to people the land with foreigners brought from a distance. Having given these commands, Epiphanes quitted Antioch, and proceeded through Mesopotamia to Persia.

27. all the forces of his realm.] According to the numbers assigned in ch. iii. 39 and ch. iv. 28 to the troops collected by Lysias, the entire armed force of the Syrian monarchy at this time should have considerably exceeded 100,000 men, since Lysias was left with only one half of the army (v. 34). The estimate does not seem to be unreasonable, since Antiochus the Great had 170,000 men at Magnesia (Appian, 'Syriaca,' p. 32), and Sidetes is said to have had 128,000 at Dora (ch. xv. 13).

28. He . . . gave his soldiers pay for a year.] The exhaustion of the Syrian treasury under Epiphanes has been already mentioned in the notes on ch. i. 20. His expenditure was reckless (see especially Polyb. xxxi. 3, 4); and it may well be that the soldiers were often left without pay, while huge sums were lavished on shows and games. Thus it was necessary, in order to secure the goodwill of the troops, to make them at the beginning of the campaign an advance of a year's pay.

29. the money of his treasures failed.] Polybius says, "he needed supplies of money" (xxxi. 11). It seems certain that the Syrian finances were seriously disordered under Antiochus Epiphanes, and that his policy was largely influenced by the necessity of obtaining supplies from one quarter or another. Hence his original attack upon the Temple of the Jews (ch. i. 21–23); and hence his present expedition into the eastern provinces which may, however, have embraced also other objects.

the tributes in the country were small.] Rather, "the tribute collectors in the country were few." Headmen of villages and plague, which he had brought upon the land ‖ in taking away the laws which had been of old time;

B. C. cir. 165.

‖ Or, for the taking away of the laws.

30 He feared ‖ that he should not be able to bear the charges any longer, nor to have such gifts to give so liberally as he did before: for he had abounded above the kings that were before him.

‖ Gr. that he should not have

31 Wherefore, being greatly perplexed in his mind, he determined to go into Persia, there to take the tributes of the countries, and to gather much money.

32 So he left Lysias, a nobleman, and one of the blood royal, to oversee the affairs of the king from the river Euphrates unto the borders of Egypt:

B. C. cir. 165.

33 And to bring up his son Antiochus, until he came again.

34 Moreover he delivered unto him the half of his forces, and the elephants, and gave him charge of all things that he would have done, as also concerning them that dwelt in Juda and Jerusalem:

35 To wit, that he should send an army against them, to destroy and root out the strength of Israel, and are the main collectors of taxes in the East. When a population became disaffected, they would refuse to act. The taxes would remain uncollected, and the result would be as expressed in the text.

because of the dissension and plague.] It would seem, from the expressions here used, that the general proclamation issued by Epiphanes, commanding uniformity in religion (ch. i. 41, 42), had provoked troubles in some regions besides Judæa, and led to a disorganisation which had told on the revenue. Setting aside Judæa, there was no part of the empire where religious reforms were so likely to be resisted as in Persia (see v. 31, and comp. ch. vi. 1–4), which clung to the religion of Zoroaster, and ultimately re-established it as the religion of the state.

in taking away the laws.] See above, ch. i. 42, "Every one should leave his laws."

30. the charges.] "The charges" are the ordinary expenses of the government, to which Epiphanes added greatly by his reckless liberality to individuals and states—often when they had absolutely no claim upon him. On occupying Naucratis, in Egypt, he went out of his way to present a gold piece to each of its Greek inhabitants (Polyb. xxviii. 17, § 11). On another occasion he sent a golden crown (worth fifty talents) to the Romans, and at the same time he sent a hundred talents to a certain number of the Grecian states (ib. 18, § 3). Polybius praises his "liberality;" but it was rather a culpable profusion that distinguished him.

liberally.] Literally, "with a lavish hand."

31. he determined to go into Persia.] "Persia" seems to be used vaguely in the two books of the Maccabees for the more eastern portion of the Syro-Macedonian kingdom. (Comp. ch. vi. 1, 5, 56; 2 Macc. i. 13, ix. 1, 21.)

to gather much money.] Antiochus did not look to obtain money solely by collection of the tribute due to him, but also by war and plunder, by the robbing of temples, and perhaps by other equivocal means. He led an expedition into Armenia early in B.C. 165, defeated the king, Artaxias, and took him prisoner (Appian, 'Syriac.' p. 117, B), and carried off a large booty (Diod. Sic. in C. Müller's 'Fragm. Hist. Gr.' vol. ii. p. x.; Strab. xi. p. 531, &c.). In the ensuing year, B.C. 164, he made the attempt to plunder the temple of Nanæa, or Anaïtis, which is recorded in ch. vi. 1–4, and in 2 Macc. ix. 2.

32. Lysias, a nobleman.] Rather "a man of note." Lysias is mentioned by Polybius, Livy, Appian, and Porphyry, as guardian of Antiochus Eupator, and regent during his minority. He was a man of considerable ability, though of no great military talent.

one of the blood royal.] Comp. 2 Macc. xi. 1.

33. his son Antiochus.] I.e. Antiochus Eupator, who succeeded his father at the age of nine (Appian) or twelve (Porphyry), and reigned two years—from B.C. 164 to B.C. 162—when he was put to death by Demetrius (ch. vii. 3, 4).

34. the half of his forces.] On their numbers, see the comment on v. 27.

and the elephants.] On the employment of war-elephants by the Syro-Macedonian kings, see note on ch. i. 17. In B.C. 164 Lysias is said to have brought eighty of these beasts against Jerusalem (2 Macc. xi. 4). Epiphanes knew that he could not make use of them in the mountain-region of Armenia, and therefore left the entire force to his officer.

35. to destroy and root out the strength of Israel.] It was not an ordinary war, but a war of extermination, that Lysias was commanded to wage. The Jews were to be utterly rooted out, and their places supplied

B. C. cir. 165. the remnant of Jerusalem, and to take away their memorial from that place;

36 And that he should place strangers in all their quarters, and divide their land by lot.

37 So the king took the half of the forces that remained, and departed from Antioch, ‖his royal city, the hundred forty and seventh year; and having passed the river Euphrates, he went through the high countries. B. C. 165. ‖ Gr. a city of his kingdom.

38 Then Lysias chose Ptolemee the son of Dorymenes, and Nicanor, by strangers. Such a system had often been followed by the Assyrian and Babylonian monarchs, and had generally proved successful. One of the best known instances was the deportation of the Israelites to Mesopotamia and Media by Tiglath-pileser and Sargon, and the re-peopling of their country by colonists from Babylon, Cutha, Susiana, Elymais, &c., by Esarhaddon (2 Kings xvii. 6, 24; Ezra iv. 9, 10). The design of Epiphanes was to effect a similar result, but by means of even greater severity, since the Jews, instead of being deported to a new locality, were to be either slain or sold as slaves. (See v. 41, and comp. 2 Macc. viii. 10, 11.)

the remnant of Jerusalem.] I.e. "the few Jews left at Jerusalem" (ch. i. 38, 53).

36. that he should place strangers.] Literally, "that strangers should settle." But perhaps the true reading is κατοικίσαι, which would give the sense of the text.

37. the half of the forces that remained.] Rather, "the half that remained of the forces." The other half, which had been assigned to Lysias, must have previously quitted Antioch.

Antioch, his royal city.] Originally Babylon had been fixed upon as the capital of the Syro-Macedonian kingdom; but Seleucus Nicator transferred the seat of government first to Seleucia, upon the Tigris, and afterwards to Antioch, which he built and called after his son. No doubt there were important interests which were best served by having the seat of government in the west; but Syria was weakened both for attack and defence by having its capital at one extremity of a long straggling territory. Antioch was from the first a flourishing city. Epiphanes had added greatly to its magnificence by carrying a broad colonnaded street through the heart of the place from one end to the other. (See K. O. Müller's 'Antiquitates Antiochenæ,' Göttingen, 1839.)

the hundred forty and seventh year.] B.C. 166–5. The departure from Antioch was probably in the spring of B.C. 165. Armenia could not be invaded with effect till about April.

having passed the river Euphrates.] The Euphrates would probably be crossed at Bir, and the march would then be by way of Orfah (Edessa) to Diarbekr (Amida), whence the way lay open into Armenia by any of the head-streams of the Tigris. The "high countries" are the mountainous tracts of upper Mesopotamia, in contrast with the low regions, which extend from the foot of the mountains to the Persian Gulf.

§ 4. Lysias sends an Army against Judæa under Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias.

38–41. Lysias, being left as regent of the western provinces, and under-estimating, it may be, the importance of the Jewish revolt, thought it sufficient to send an army to carry out the designs of the king, and did not lead it in person. Probably he remained at Antioch. The generals whom he selected were Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, governor of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia (2 Macc. viii. 8); Nicanor, the son of Patroclus (ib. v. 9); and Gorgias, a captain of great experience (ibid.). The army under their command consisted of 40,000 foot and 7000 horse, according to our author; but of 20,000 men only, according to the writer of the Second Book of the Maccabees (l. s. c.). Like Seron's army, it took the line of the coast tract, and moved into the Philistine plain, where it occupied a station near Emmaus. The army was swollen by some native Syrian and Philistine levies, while the camp was crowded with merchants from the same regions, attracted by the expectation of a large sale of Jewish captives at low prices (2 Macc. viii. 11).

38. Lysias chose Ptolemee the son of Dorymenes.] "Ptolemee, the son of Dorymenes," seems to be the same person as the "Ptolemy surnamed Macron," of 2 Macc. x. 12. If so, he was quite unconnected with the Egyptian Ptolemies, being the son of an Ætolian. He had, however, taken service under Ptolemy Philometor, and been by him made governor of Cyprus, but deserted this post, and transferred himself to the service of Epiphanes (2 Macc. x. 12, 13), who received him with favour, and gave him the government of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia (ib. viii. 6). At this time Ptolemy had been apprised by "Philip the Phrygian," governor of Jerusalem (2 Macc. v. 22), of the perilous state of affairs in Judæa, and had probably made a

B. C. cir. 165. and Gorgias, mighty men of the king's friends:

39 And with them he sent forty thousand footmen, and seven thousand horsemen, to go into the land of Juda, and to destroy it, as the king commanded.

40 So they went forth with all their power, and came and pitched by Emmaus in the plain country.

41 And the merchants of the country, hearing the fame of them, took silver and gold very much, with ‖servants, and came into the camp to buy the children of Israel for slaves: a power also of Syria and of the land ‖of the Philistines joined themselves unto them.

B. C. cir. 165

‖ Or, fetters.

‖ Or, of strangers.

42 Now when Judas and his brethren saw that miseries were multi-report on the subject to Lysias, who thereupon gave him a command.

Nicanor.] Nicanor is placed at the head of the expedition by the writer of the Second Book (ch. viii. 9–24), who gives Ptolemy no part in it, and barely mentions the name of Gorgias (ibid. v. 9).

39. forty thousand footmen, and seven thousand horsemen.] These numbers are confirmed by Josephus, and are not intrinsically improbable. The Syriac version has, however, "ten thousand" in the place of forty thousand, and the author of the Second Book estimates the entire force at 20,000 (2 Macc. viii. 9).

40. by Emmaus in the plain country.] This Emmaus is undoubtedly the city known afterwards as Nicopolis, which was twenty-two Roman miles distant from Jerusalem and ten from Lydda. (See 'Itin. Hieros.' p. 600, Wesseling.) It lay in the Philistine plain, at the foot of the mountains of Judæa, and is now represented by the small village of Amwas (Robinson, 'Researches in Palestine,' vol. iii. p. 147). The "Emmaus" of St. Luke's Gospel (xxiv. 13) must have been a different place.

41. the merchants of the country.] The dealers were probably, in the main, Phœnicians, though the seaport towns of Philistia may have furnished some. According to the author of the Second Book, Nicanor had apprised the merchants of his intention to sell the Jewish captives, and had fixed the low rate of ninety for a talent (less than 3*l.* each) as the price at which they would be sold (2 Macc. viii. 11).

with servants.] It is not very clear why these "servants" should be mentioned. The Syrian version has "fetters and chains," Josephus "fetters." We may suspect the mistake of a copyist, who wrote παῖδας for πέδας. The dealers brought "fetters" to place upon such of their purchases as they might deem dangerous.

a power also of Syria.] I.e. native Syrians not enrolled in the Syro-Macedonian army. They were attracted probably by the hope of plunder.

of the land of the Philistines.] Literally, "the land of foreigners." But the expression is often used, both in the Canonical and the Apocryphal books, to designate the Philistines. (See below, ch. iv. 30; v. 66, 68, &c.)

§ 5. JUDAS TAKES HIS FORCES TO MIZPEH, OVER AGAINST JERUSALEM, AND MAKES APPEAL TO GOD IN SIGHT OF THE HOLY CITY.

42–54. On learning the extreme danger that now threatened the patriots—their extermination decreed, and nearly 50,000 men sent to effect the execution of the decree—Judas took a remarkable resolution. He resolved, before engaging his new adversaries, to approach Jerusalem as closely as he could, and in the sight of the Temple and the Holy City to "make prayer to God, and ask mercy and compassion" (v. 44). He accordingly "led his scanty host over the mountains to the ridge of Mizpeh—the spot where Alexander had met Jaddua, and where, after the Chaldæan capture of Jerusalem, the pilgrims had come to wail over the Holy City. It was a mournful scene. They could see from that high rocky platform the deserted streets, the walls and gates closed as if of a besieged town, the silent precincts of the Temple, the Greek garrison in the fortress. Before that distant presence of the Holy Place, to which they could gain no nearer access, the mourners came wrapt in tatters of black hair-cloth, with ashes on their heads. They spread out the copies of the law they waved the sacerdotal vestments they shewed the animals and the vegetables due for firstfruits and tithes, they passed in long procession the Nazarites with their flowing tresses, who were unable to dedicate themselves in the sanctuary." (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 307–8.) After this, they called on God to be their helper, and concluded their "sorrowful ceremony" with a blast of trumpets, emblematic of expected triumph.

42. when Judas saw that miseries were multiplied.] Rather, "that evil increased upon them." Each success

B. C. cir. 165.

plied, and that the forces did encamp themselves in their borders; for they knew how the king had given commandment to destroy the people, and utterly abolish them;

43 They said one to another, Let us restore the decayed estate of our people, and let us fight for our people and the sanctuary.

44 Then was the congregation gathered together, that they might be ready for battle, and that they might pray, and ask mercy and compassion.

45 Now Jerusalem lay void [b]as a wilderness, there was none of her children that went in or out: the sanctuary also was trodden down, and aliens kept the strong hold; the heathen had their habitation in that place; and joy was taken from Jacob, and the pipe with the harp ceased.

B. C. cir. 165.

[b] ch. 1. 38, 39.

46 Wherefore the Israelites assembled themselves together, and came to [‖]Maspha, over against Jerusalem; for [c]in Maspha was the place where they prayed aforetime in Israel.

‖ Or, Mitzpa.

[c] Judg. 20. 1. 1 Sam. 7. 5.

47 Then they fasted that day, and seemed only to bring them into greater difficulty.

for they knew.] Rather, "and knew." to destroy the people, and utterly abolish them.] See above, vv. 35, 36. The extremity of their danger aroused extreme enthusiasm. The resistance would have been less desperate, and might possibly have been less successful, had Antiochus been content with milder measures.

43. They said one to another.] The movement is represented as spontaneous and general. "Each man said to his neighbour, Let us upraise the low estate of our people," &c. No doubt, Judas directed the general enthusiasm; but it burst forth of itself, and required no stimulus. The congregation gathered itself together (v. 44), and was ready either for battle or for supplication. Judas took advantage of the stir of feeling, and, quitting the neighbourhood of Emmaus, took his army to the heights of Mizpeh.

45. Jerusalem lay void as a wilderness.] This is not to be taken quite literally. A certain number of the inhabitants of Jerusalem had conformed to the decrees of Antiochus (ch. i. 52), and had "remained" in the city (ch. ii. 18). But her true children had left her. And to those who gazed from Mizpeh into her comparatively empty streets and squares, it seemed as if the populous city had become a desert, and was no more inhabited.

aliens kept the strong hold.] See ch. i. 33–36. A Syro-Macedonian garrison held the fortress, which had been seized and fortified when Apollonius made his first attack.

the heathen had their habitation in that place.] Rather, "she was a dwelling-place for the heathen." Jerusalem, deserted (in the main) by her own children, had become a city of the heathen.

the pipe with the harp ceased.] Isaiah, speaking of the Israelites, says that "the harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe, were in their feasts" (ch. v. 12). A similar employment of music at festivals is touched upon by Amos (ch. vi. 5). Under the existing calamities there was an end of feasting, and consequently a cessation of music. (Cf. Is. xiv. 11.)

46. Maspha.] Literally, "Massepha." The identity of "Maspha," or "Massepha," with Mizpah or Mizpeh, is generally allowed. The LXX. express Mizpah by "Maspha" in 2 Chron. xvi. 6 and Neh. iii. 7, 15; in 1 Sam. they use the longer form "Massephath," which is almost identical with the "Massepha" of the present passage, th being a mere feminine ending. The exact situation, however, of Mizpeh has been much controverted. Dr. Robinson places it on Neby-Samwil, five miles from Jerusalem, to the north-west ('Researches,' vol. i. p. 460). But this seems too far off to suit the present description. Recent travellers have therefore sought another site for Mizpeh, and have found it on the broad ridge directly north of the city, which is a continuation of the Mount of Olives, whence there is an excellent view of both the city and the temple site. The distance is considerably less than a mile; and the site is undoubtedly that of the "Scopus" of Josephus ('Bell. Jud.' v. 2, § 3), which seems to be a Greek translation of the Hebrew Mizpeh, "a watch-tower." Here is a village called Safat, or Shafat, which seems to be a corruption of the ancient name.

in Maspha was the place where they prayed aforetime in Israel.] On the sacred character attaching to Mizpeh in early times, see Judg. xx. 1; 1 Sam. vii. 5, 6; x. 17–25. Jerome says that it is one of the places where the ark abode for a time ('Quæst. Heb.' on 1 Sam. vii. 2).

47. they fasted, &c.] They began with humiliation, accumulating all its various signs

B. C. cir. 165.

put on sackcloth, and cast ashes upon their heads, and rent their clothes, 48 And laid open the book of the law, ‖ wherein the heathen had sought to paint the likeness of their images.

‖ Or, for the which the heathen had made diligent search, that they might paint therein the likeness of their idols.

49 They brought also the priests' garments, and the firstfruits, and the tithes: and the [d] Nazarites they stirred up, who had accomplished their days.

[d] Numb. 6. 2, 13.

50 Then cried they with a loud voice toward heaven, saying, What shall we do with these, and whither shall we carry them away?

B. C. cir. 165.

51 For thy sanctuary is trodden down and profaned, and thy priests are in heaviness, and brought low.

52 And, lo, the heathen are assembled together against us to destroy us: what things they imagine against us, thou knowest.

53 How shall we be able to stand against them, except thou, O God, be our help?

54 Then sounded they with trumpets, and cried with a loud voice.

—sackcloth, clothes rent, ashes on the head, and fasting. (Comp. 1 Kings xxi. 27; Jonah iii. 6.) The intention, no doubt, was to acknowledge their own sinfulness in God's sight, before entreating His favour.

48. And laid open the book of the law.] It would seem by the expression used that they had but one copy, or at any rate that they produced only one. The Syro-Macedonians had torn up and burnt the greater number of the copies at the beginning of the persecution (ch. i. 56). They had been content, however, with disfiguring some by pictures of their own idols, or perhaps rather of their deities. It was to exhibit this profanation before the eye of God that the Book was "laid open." Compare the act of Hezekiah, when he "spread before the Lord" the blasphemous letter of Sennacherib (2 Kings xix. 14).

the heathen had sought to paint the likeness.] Only a few of the MSS. preserve the true reading. The majority, and most of the printed texts, omit the mention of "painting."

49. They brought also the priests' garments.] On the holy garments commanded for the Jewish priests, see Ex. xxviii. 4–42. Apparently, they were now exhibited to shew that Judas and his followers were ready and anxious to resume the Temple worship, and only hindered by Jerusalem being in hostile hands. It was recognised that there could be no sacrificial worship outside the Temple.

and the firstfruits, and the tithes.] It had been determined in the time of Nehemiah, that all the firstfruits, and "the tithe of the tithes"—i.e. the priests' portion—should be carried every year to the Temple, and there made over to the sacerdotal authorities, who were thus to be spared the trouble and expense of collection (Neh. x. 35–39). The firstfruits and tithes were now brought as near to the Temple as possible under the circumstances, to indicate the readiness of the people to conform to the law of God in all things, so far as they could.

and the Nazarites they stirred up.] The completion of the ordinary, or limited, Nazarite vow could only take place in the Temple, where certain offerings had to be made, and the hair, which had been left untouched during the term of the vow, had to be cut off and burnt under the sacrifice upon the altar (Num. vi. 13–18). The Nazarites were now "stirred up" to come and present themselves as near the Temple as possible, to shew their readiness to complete their vows, unless hindered by the heathen.

50. Then cried they with a loud voice toward heaven.] "Crying toward heaven" is the ordinary expression of the writer for making an appeal to God. (See ch. iv. 10, 40; v. 31; ix. 46, &c.)

What shall we do with these?] I.e. How shall we enable them to complete their vow? Whither shall we take them? We cannot take them to the Temple. Will not God shew us a way out of these difficulties?

53. except thou, O God, be our help.] The first thing is humiliation (v. 47); the next, an exposition of their enemies' impiety (v. 48); the third, a setting forth of their own needs (vv. 49–52); in conclusion, there is an appeal to God for aid (v. 53). This appeal is accompanied by a loud blare of trumpets, and a shout that was heard far and wide (v. 54). The blast of trumpets was not a mere signal for breaking up the camp (Num. x. 2)—united, as it was, with the loud shout, we must understand it as in part a defiance to the garrison in Jerusalem, in part an expression of confidence in the speedy triumph of the good cause.

§ 6. MILITARY MEASURES TAKEN BY JUDAS IN VIEW OF THE IMPENDING DANGER.

55–60. It would seem that hitherto the Jews under Judas had fought as an un-

B. C. cir. 165.

55 And after this Judas ordained captains over the people, even captains over thousands, and over hundreds, and over fifties, and over tens.

[e] Deut. 20. 5, &c.

[f] Judg. 7. 3.

56 But as for such as [e]were building houses, or had betrothed wives, or were planting vineyards, or [f]were fearful, those he commanded that they should return, every man to his own house, according to the law.

57 So the camp removed, and pitched upon the south side of Emmaus.

58 And Judas said, Arm yourselves, and be valiant men, and see that ye be in readiness against the morning, that ye may fight with these nations, that are assembled together against us to destroy us and our sanctuary:

B. C. cir. 165.

59 For it is better for us to die in battle, than to behold the calamities of our people and our sanctuary.

60 Nevertheless, [g]as the will of God is in heaven, so let him do.

[g] 2 Sam. 10. 12.

CHAPTER IV.

6 Judas defeateth the plot, 14 and forces of Gorgias, 23 and spoileth their tents, 34 and overthroweth Lysias. 45 He pulleth down the altar which the heathen had profaned, and setteth up a new: 60 and maketh a wall about Sion.

disciplined mass, with no officers but Judas and his brothers to guide them. Now that he had to contend with half the might of Syria (v. 34), the leader recognised the necessity of having recourse to something more of system. A decimal organisation seemed the easiest, and was already familiar to the thoughts of the nation from its adoption in former times. (See Ex. xviii. 21; Judg. xx. 10; 1 Sam. viii. 12; 2 Kings i. 9; xi. 4; 2 Chr. xxv. 5.) Accordingly, he introduced it in the old familiar shape, which, though not theoretically perfect, had been practically found convenient. A petty officer was appointed to each ten men, a superior one to five such bodies, a captain to each hundred, and a colonel to each thousand. Before, however, this arrangement had been made, the army was weeded of its less willing members—the timorous, the newly-married, and the immersed in worldly business—according to the injunctions laid down in Deuteronomy (ch. xx. 5–8)—and a picked force was thus obtained. The enemy was then sought out, the army returning to the neighbourhood of Emmaus; and in a short spirited harangue Judas bade them prepare to give the Syrians battle on the morrow.

55. Judas ordained captains over the people.] The arrangement is identical with that recommended by Jethro to Moses for judicial purposes (Ex. xviii. 21). It differs from the ordinary Jewish military system by the institution of "captains of tens."

56. such as were building houses.] These may have been a tolerably numerous class, since the patriots were to a large extent fugitives from Jerusalem and other towns, who, having quitted their houses, would have to build others.

or were fearful.] Compare the action of Gideon (Judg. vii. 3), who, by dismissing the "fearful," reduced his army from 32,000 to 10,000. The reduction may not have been great in the present instance, since few but brave men would have been likely to join the patriots.

57. So the camp removed.] Judas never sought to avoid battle, or stood simply on the defensive. When a force was sent against him, his object was to engage it—in the confident belief that, with God's help, he would overcome it. So, having held his prayer-meeting at Mizpeh, he broke up his camp, and marched westward, a distance of above twenty miles, to meet the enemy, whose position at Emmaus was well known to him.

and pitched upon the south side of Emmaus.] Emmaus was at the northern foot of a spur which projected into the Philistine plain from the hill-country of Judæa. Judas, while encamping south of Emmaus, still remained on the high ground.

58. Arm yourselves.] Literally, "gird yourselves," but in the general sense of "prepare"—"make ready."

60. as the will of God is in heaven, so let him do.] Absolute resignation to the will of God is nowhere better expressed. Judas was content to succeed or fail, as God chose. Only, he hoped that, if he failed, he might be allowed to die (v. 59).

CHAPTER IV.

§ 1. JUDAS AND HIS MEN DEFEAT AND DISPERSE THE FORCES UNDER NICANOR AND GORGIAS.

1–27. The army under Judas is said in 2 Macc. viii. 16 to have numbered six thousand men. As the Syro-Macedonians were more than seven times as numerous (ch. iii. 39), it did

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 165. THEN took Gorgias five thousand footmen, and a thousand of the best horsemen, and removed out of the camp by night;

2 To the end he might rush in upon the camp of the Jews, and smite them suddenly. And the men of the fortress were his guides.

3 Now when Judas heard thereof, he himself removed, and the valiant men with him, that he might smite the king's army which was at Emmaus, B. C. cir. 165.

4 While as yet the forces were dispersed from the camp.

5 In the mean season came Gorgias by night into the camp of Judas: and when he found no man there, he sought them in the mountains: for said he, These fellows flee from us.

6 But as soon as it was day, Judas shewed himself in the plain with not seem a risk to their commanders to divide their force in two, and send a portion into the mountains to attack the Jewish camp, if a favourable opportunity offered, while the main body still continued in the plain. The command of the attacking force, which just equalled the army of Judas, was taken by Gorgias, the captain of "great experience" (2 Macc. viii. 9), while Nicanor remained at the head of the others, who occupied a fortified camp in the plain. Nothing is heard of Ptolemy, who was apparently absent. Gorgias hoped to surprise Judas, and to this end made a night march from Emmaus into the hill-country; but Judas, learning his intention, frustrated it by a counter-movement, abandoning his camp to Gorgias, while he flung himself on the forces of Nicanor. The result was a complete victory (vv. 14, 15; 2 Macc. viii. 24, 25). Nicanor's army was routed and dispersed, after which battle was offered to Gorgias, who declined it, and retreated with precipitation (vv. 16–22). The first attempt of Lysias thus completely failed. Out of the 47,000 men engaged in the war, 9000 were slain outright, and probably a still larger number wounded (2 Macc. viii. 24). Lysias was greatly disappointed and discouraged, but still determined to make a further effort to carry out the king's designs in the ensuing year.

1. Then took Gorgias five thousand footmen.] It is not clear whether Gorgias made his movement at the request of Nicanor, and in concert with him, or whether he had an independent command, and acted on his own responsibility. Dean Stanley supposes him to have been "commander of the forces at Jerusalem" ('Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 308). But nothing has been said of his having quitted Emmaus (ch. iii. 38–40); and it seems best to suppose that he had remained there till now. Verse 4 makes this almost certain.

removed out of the camp by night.] Rather, "his camp" or "his army removed by night."

2. the men of the fortress were his guides.] This is generally explained as "apostates from the citadel of Jerusalem." But the "fortress" intended may be the citadel of Emmaus. Persons belonging to the neighbourhood were likely to be better guides than men who came from a distance.

3. when Judas heard.] Judas had his "intelligence department," and was quickly apprised of the enemy's movement. To him the division of the Syro-Macedonian force seemed a strategic mistake, and he resolved at once to take advantage of it. "While as yet the forces were dispersed from the camp" (v. 4), he determined to make an onslaught on those who remained to guard it. He may not have known their numbers, but he felt that at any rate it was best to fight before the troops of Gorgias rejoined those of Nicanor. (Cf. Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, § 4.)

5. came Gorgias by night into the camp of Judas.] This was what Judas had intended: he had left his tents standing, and had thus drawn Gorgias on. He may even have left booty in the camp, to occupy the attention of the soldiers. Meanwhile he had himself descended into the plain with 3000 men (v. 6), leaving perhaps 3000 as a reserve on the outlying hills.

he sought them in the mountains.] Gorgias thought that the soldiers of Judas, learning his approach, had fled and concealed themselves in the fastnesses of the mountains, and proceeded inland, in search of them.

6. as soon as it was day, Judas shewed himself in the plain.] On the Jews' part the time for night attacks was past (2 Macc. viii. 7). Broad daylight best suits a foe who is confident of victory, either in his own strength, or through trust in a strength that is not his, but vouchsafed to him. Judas descended into the plain by night, but waited for the day to make his dispositions, and proceed to the assault. The exact dispositions which he made are given in the Second Book (2 Macc. viii. 22, 23); which, however, doubles the number of the Jewish army engaged in the struggle.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166.

three thousand men, who nevertheless had neither ‖armour nor swords to their minds.

‖ Or, targets.

7 And they saw the camp of the heathen, that it was strong and well harnessed, and compassed round about with horsemen; and these were expert of war.

8 Then said Judas to the men that were with him, Fear ye not their multitude, neither be ye afraid of their assault.

[a] Exod. 14. 30.

9 Remember how [a]our fathers were delivered in the Red sea, when Pharaoh pursued them with an army.

10 Now therefore let us cry unto heaven, if peradventure the Lord will have mercy upon us, and remember the covenant of our fathers, and destroy this host before our face this day:

B. C. cir. 166.

11 [b]That so all the heathen may know that there is one who delivereth and saveth Israel.

[b] 1 Sam. 17. 46.

12 Then the strangers lifted up their eyes, and saw them coming over against them.

13 Wherefore they went out of the camp to battle; but they that were with Judas sounded their trumpets.

14 So they joined battle, and the heathen being discomfited fled into the plain.

who . . . had neither armour nor swords to their minds.] See note on ch. iii. 12.

7. the camp of the heathen.] Some translate, "the host of the heathen," but probably the camp is intended. (Comp. v. 13.)

well harnessed.] I.e. well guarded with a rampart or breastwork. So θώρηξ is used by Herodotus (i. 181), and θωράκιον by Diodorus (xvii. 44), Philo (ii. 324), and others.

compassed round about with horsemen.] Patrols of horse guarded the camp on every side, so that it was impossible to surprise it.

8. Then said Judas, &c.] This seems to be the place where the fuller account of 2 Macc. viii. 16–23 properly comes in. Judas addressed his men at some length; exhorted them not to be afraid of the enemy (2 Macc. viii. 16); reminded them of the wrongs which they had suffered at their hands (ib. v. 17); spoke of former deliverances — that from Pharaoh at the Red Sea (1 Macc. iv. 9), that from Sennacherib (2 Macc. viii. 19), and that from the Celtic invaders of Asia somewhat recently (ib. v. 20); and finally bade them make an earnest appeal to heaven for help and salvation (1 Macc. iv. 10, 11); after which he made a fresh disposition of his force. Dividing it into four equal bands, assuming the command of one of them himself, and assigning the other three to his brothers John, Simon, and Jonathan respectively, he ordered the fifth brother, Eleazar, to recite from the Holy Book (2 Macc. viii. 21–23); and then, while the words sounded in their ears, commanded his army to advance to the attack, himself leading the way.

Fear ye not.] Comp. ch. iii. 22.

their multitude.] Even if Judas advanced with his entire force of six thousand men (2 Macc. viii. 16, 22), still he was outnumbered at least sevenfold (ch. iii. 39, 41; iv. 1).

11. That so all the heathen may know.] Comp. Ex. xv. 14; Ps. lix. 13, lxxix. 10; lxxxiii. 18, xcviii. 2, &c. The vindication of God's honour in the sight of the heathen is one of the most legitimate objects of human effort; and the saints of God make it the subject of frequent petition. Moses in the wilderness has no more potent argument either when he requests God's aid, or when he deprecates the punishments which the people's sins have deserved. (See Ex. xxxii. 12; Num. xiv. 15, 16; Deut. ix. 28; xxxii. 27, &c.)

12. the strangers lifted up their eyes.] The enemy, to their surprise, saw the small Jewish force rapidly advancing upon them across the plain. They could not for very shame decline the combat, so they quitted their walled camp (v. 7), and drew themselves up in order of battle (v. 13). The Jews, as they charged, blew their well-known trumpet-blast, an encouragement to themselves, a terror to the adversary.

14. being discomfited.] The expression used in the original is stronger, implying a crushing defeat.

fled into the plain.] There is a slight difficulty here, since Emmaus itself was "in the plain" (ch. iii. 40), and Judas has descended "into the plain" (ch. iv. 6), in order to attack the Syro-Macedonian army. Probably the writer is thinking of the entire broad tract of Philistia, and regarding that as the true plain, rather than the embayed recess about Emmaus, which was a sort of valley connected with the plain.

B. C. cir. 165.

15 Howbeit all the hindmost of them were slain with the sword: for they pursued them unto ‖ Gazera, and unto the plains of Idumea, and Azotus, and Jamnia, so that there were slain of them upon a three thousand men.

‖ Gr. Assaremoth.

16 This done, Judas returned again with his host from pursuing them,

17 And said to the people, Be not greedy of the spoils, inasmuch as there is a battle before us,

18 And Gorgias and his host are here by us in the mountain: but stand ye now against our enemies, and overcome them, and after this ye may boldly take the spoils.

B. C. cir. 165.

19 As Judas was yet speaking these words, there appeared a part of them looking out of the mountain:

20 Who when they perceived that the Jews had put their host to flight, and were burning the tents; for the smoke that was seen declared what was done:

15. they pursued them unto Gazera.] The position of "Gazêra" (or Gazara), long regarded as uncertain, seems to have been fixed by the discoveries of M. Clermont-Ganneau, who first found a Tel-el-Jezer mentioned by the Arabian geographers in the required locality, then obtained the same name from the present inhabitants, and finally came upon a rock inscription in which the name of Gezer was repeated twice ('Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund,' Oct. 1875, pp. 200–1). The position is one three miles W. of Khulda, and about six E. of Akir (Ekron), at a village called Abu-Shooshah, of which the Tel forms a part. The distance from Emmaus (Amwas) is about eight miles.

the plains of Idumea, &c.] The defeated army, having kept together as far as Gazara, there separated, and fled in three directions, westward to "the plain of Jamnia," marked by the modern Yebneh, in the Sorek valley; south-westward to "the plain of Ashdod," marked by the modern Esdûd; and southward or south-eastward to "the plain of Idumæa," the country south of Judæa, between Hebron and Beersheba. The limits of Idumæa, vague at all times, are perhaps extended by the writer so as to include the flat country about Tel-el-Safi and Merash or Mareshah.

Azotus.] The identity of the ancient Ashdod (or Azotus) with the modern Esdûd is generally allowed. Esdûd is situated about three miles from the coast, a little south of the water-course known as the "valley of Elah." It stands on a slight elevation, which looks down upon the plain, and makes the situation a commanding one. Ashdod was one of the most ancient of the Philistine towns (Josh. xv. 47; 1 Sam. v. 5). It was taken by Sargon in B.C. 711, and by Psamatik I. about B.C. 630, after a long siege (Herod. ii. 157).

Jamnia.] "Jamnia" appears as Jabneel in Joshua (xv. 11), and as Jabneh in Chronicles (2 Chr. xxvi. 6). It was some three or four miles from the sea, but had a port dependent on it, which bore the same name (2 Macc. xii. 9; Plin. 'H. N.' v. 12). Ordinarily, it was a Philistine possession. The site seems to be marked by the modern Yebneh, a small village south of the Sorek, eleven miles from Joppa, and sixteen from Esdûd.

there were slain of them upon a three thousand.] The writer of the Second Book says "nine thousand" (2 Macc. viii. 24), which is more in accord with the strong expression used above, in v. 14. He adds that "the most part of Nicanor's host" was "wounded and maimed" by the patriots.

16. Judas returned again from pursuing them.] The battle took place upon the sixth day of the week, and by the time that Gazara was reached the sabbath was approaching. Judas therefore withdrew his men, being unwilling to desecrate the sabbath, and contented himself with firing the camp and despoiling the slain of their armour (2 Macc. viii. 27). The other reason here alleged for the recall—the near presence of Gorgias—may also have actuated him.

17. Be not greedy of the spoils.] I.e. "wait for the present—do not attempt to plunder the camp—if you were once engaged in plundering, Gorgias might take you at a disadvantage."

there is a battle before us.] Rather perhaps, "there is war before us," the entire force of the enemy is not accounted for—Gorgias still remains somewhere in our neighbourhood: the war is not over.

18. in the mountain.] Rather, "in the hill-country." (Cf. v. 5.)

boldly.] Or "confidently." Without any fear of a hostile attack upon you on the part of Gorgias.

19–22. The detachment under Gorgias, having searched the interior of the hill-country

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 165.

21 When therefore they perceived these things, they were sore afraid, and seeing also the host of Judas in the plain ready to fight, 22 They fled every one into the land of strangers.

23 Then Judas returned to spoil the tents, where they got much gold, and silver, and blue silk, and purple of the sea, and great riches.

24 After this they went home, and sung a song of thanksgiving, and praised the Lord in heaven: [c] because ‖ it is good, because his mercy endureth for ever.

B. C. cir. 165.

‖ Or, he.

25 Thus Israel had a great deliverance that day.

26 Now all the strangers that had escaped came and told Lysias what had happened:

27 Who, when he heard thereof, was confounded and discouraged, because neither such things as he would were done unto Israel, nor such things as the king commanded him were come to pass.

[c] Ps. 136. 1.

near Emmaus and found no trace of Judas or his army, had returned to the outskirts, and "looked out" from some high position upon the plain. The sight revealed to them was that of Nicanor's camp in flames, and his troops dispersed far and wide over the Shefelah (v. 15), while the army of Judas was drawn up in battle array, ready for combat. It is not surprising that, under these circumstances, his troops "were sore afraid," and "fled every one" into the Philistine country, seeking to rejoin the troops of Nicanor.

23. Judas returned to spoil the tents.] Rather, "the camp"—no doubt the camp of Nicanor, near Emmaus. The inflammable portions had been burnt; but the flames would have made small impression on the more valuable portion of the spoil. There would remain an abundance of arms and armour (2 Macc. viii. 27), sorely needed by the patriots (1 Macc. iv. 6); there would be silver and gold, in specie, in ornaments, in vases and drinking-cups; there would be precious stuffs and fabrics, damaged, it may be, more or less, but still of considerable value. Judas and his men "got much gold, and silver, and blue (silk), and purple of the sea, and great riches."

blue silk.] There is no word expressive of "silk" in the original; and it is more than doubtful whether "silk" is intended. The blue of the Tabernacle was either a woollen or a linen fabric (Ex. xxxv. 25); and the same may be said of the "blue" of Solomon's Temple (2 Chr. ii. 7, 14). There is no distinct reference to silk in the Old Testament; and it is scarcely likely to have been found in the camp of Nicanor. The blue, or rather violet, apparel found, would probably be of wool, as would be also the purple (or crimson) apparel.

purple of the sea.] I.e. apparel dyed with the juice of the Murex trunculus, a shell-fish common in the eastern Mediterranean, and particularly abundant upon the coast of Phœnicia. The hue varied from a deep purple to a light crimson. It was greatly affected by the Eastern nations (Ex. xxv. 4; Judg. viii. 26; 2 Chr. iii. 14; Esther i. 6, viii. 15; Prov. xxxi. 22; Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 7, 16; Ecclus. xlv. 10; Baruch vi. 12; 1 Macc. x. 20; 2 Macc. iv. 38, &c.).

24. they went home.] Literally, "they returned"—i.e. quitted the plain, and re-occupied the hill-country.

praised the Lord in heaven.] Rather, "they praised the Lord unto the heaven"—i.e. with eyes and voices lifted up to heaven.

because it is good, &c.] I.e. they sang the usual hymn of thanksgiving—the hundred and thirty-sixth Psalm—"the national anthem" (as it has been called) "of the Jewish race" (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 308–9). Cf. 1 Chr. xvi. 41; 2 Chr. v. 13, vii. 3, xx. 21; Jer. xxxiii. 11; Ezra iii. 11.

26. all the strangers.] The Syro-Macedonian soldiers. (Cf. v. 12.)

§ 2. Attack made on Judas by Lysias in person.

28–35. The defeat of his generals induced Lysias to take the field in person. Having spent the winter in collecting a force almost half as numerous again as the former one—60,000 foot and 5000 horse—he marched early in the ensuing year, B.C. 164, into Idumæa, and took up a position at Bethsura, or Beth-zur, on the road from Hebron to Jerusalem, about five miles from the former and thirteen from the latter place. Here Judas met him, with an army of 10,000 men. After the Jewish chief had prayed earnestly for a blessing on his arms (vv. 30–33), the two hosts joined battle, and once more the Syro-Macedonians suffered a complete defeat. The slain are estimated at 5000, and the wounded must have been much more numerous. Lysias accepted the trial of arms as decisive, and returned to Antioch without

B. C. cir. 164.

28 The next year therefore following Lysias gathered together threescore thousand choice men of foot, and five thousand horsemen, that he might subdue them.

29 So they came into Idumea, and pitched their tents at Bethsura, and Judas met them with ten thousand men.

30 And when he saw that mighty army, he prayed and said, Blessed art thou, O Saviour of Israel, [d] who didst quell the violence of the mighty man by the hand of thy servant David, and gavest the host of ‖strangers into the hands of [e] Jonathan the son of Saul, and his armourbearer;

B. C. cir. 164.

‖ Or, Philistines.

[d] 1 Sam. 17. 50, 51.

[e] 1 Sam. 14. 13, 14.

31 Shut up this army in the hand of thy people Israel, and let them be confounded in their power and horsemen:

32 Make them to be of no courage, and cause the boldness of their strength to ‖fall away, and let them quake at their destruction:

‖ Gr. melt

33 Cast them down with the sword making any further effort. His only hope was in his power of collecting a still larger force, and making another expedition (v. 35).

28. threescore thousand choice men.] As large a force as he could easily raise, seeing that Antiochus had left him one-half only of the military strength of the empire (ch. iii. 34).

five thousand horsemen.] The proportion is unusually small. But it was difficult for cavalry to act in the hill-country of Judæa.

that he might subdue them.] Rather, "to the end that he might utterly subdue them." It is implied that Lysias thought the force which he had gathered together would be irresistible, and must shortly bring the rebellion to an end. As Judas was unable to muster more than 10,000 men against 65,000, the expectation was not unreasonable.

29. So they came into Idumea.] This was strategy of a new character. The Syro-Macedonians marched round their enemies' left flank, and effected a lodgment in their rear. The Idumæans, being hostile to the Jews at all times (Num. xx. 21; 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Kings xi. 16; 2 Kings viii. 20; Ps. cxxxvii. 7; Ezek. xxv. 12; 2 Chron. xxviii. 17; &c.), would be sure to support the attack, and do their best to make it successful (ch. v. 3). If the attempt succeeded, the Jews would be caught in a trap from which there was no escape, and either slaughtered or made prisoners.

and pitched their tents at Bethsura.] Bethsura appears as Beth-zur, "the House of the Rock," in Josh. xv. 58, where its position is marked as in the mountains reckoned to Judah, between Halhul and Gedor. It was among the towns fortified by Rehoboam in expectation of the attack of Shishak (2 Chr. xi. 7); and was still regarded as belonging to Judah in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 16). It had now passed, however, from the Jews into the hands of the Idumæans, and was a strong fortress on the border of the two countries. (See v. 61, and cf. ch. vi. 7, 26; ix. 52; xiv. 33; &c.) At a later date it was called Bethasora ('Itin. Hieros.' p. 599, 1), and is now known as Beit-Sur. The position is commanding, and is well supplied with water ('Quarterly Statement of Pal. Expl. Fund,' April 1875, p. 67).

with ten thousand men.] A larger force than he had ever gathered together before. It was natural that his successes should swell his army.

30. O Saviour of Israel.] The exact expression, "Saviour of Israel," is found only here and in Jer. xiv. 8. But expressions closely akin occur in Judg. iii. 9; 2 Kings xiii. 5; Is. xlix. 26, lx. 26, lxiii. 8, &c. The God of the Old Testament was well known as the Saviour of His people from the time of Moses downwards.

who didst quell the violence of the mighty man by the hand of thy servant David.] The allusion is probably to David's victory over Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 38–51).

and gavest the host of strangers into the hands of Jonathan.] Rather, "the host of the Philistines." The occasion intended is that which nearly cost Jonathan his life, when he and his armour-bearer smote the Philistine camp in Michmash, and Jonathan unwittingly contravened the command of Saul, that none should eat food until the evening (1 Sam. xiv. 6–27).

31. Shut up this army in the hand.] Or, "deliver this army into the hand." See note on ch. iii. 18.

let them be confounded.] Literally, "let them be brought to shame."

in their power and horsemen.] "Power" (δύναμις) is used by the writer especially of foot-soldiers (see ch. xv. 41).

32. Make them to be of no courage.] Literally, "give them cowardice."

cause the boldness of their strength to fall

B. C. cir. 164.

of them that love thee, and let all those that know thy name praise thee with thanksgiving.

34 So they joined battle; and there were slain of the host of Lysias about five thousand men, even before them were they slain.

35 Now when Lysias saw his army put to flight, and the manliness of Judas' soldiers, and how they were ready either to live or die valiantly, he went into Antiochia, and gathered together a company of strangers, and having made his army greater than it was, he purposed to come again into Judea.

B. C. cir. 164.

36 Then said Judas and his brethren, Behold, our enemies are discomfited: let us go up to cleanse and ‖ dedicate the sanctuary.

‖ Or, repair.

away.] Rather, "melt the boldness of their strength," or "cause it to melt away."

33. let all those that know thy name praise thee.] I.e. "let us be victorious, and then we shall sing to thee a psalm of thanksgiving." (Cf. v. 24.)

35. Lysias . . . gathered together a company of strangers.] Rather, "proceeded to levy mercenaries." This is the constant meaning of ξενολογεῖν and its cognate terms in Polybius, Plutarch, Diodorus, and other late Greek writers. It even occurs in the same sense in Isocrates and Demosthenes. Lysias having found the full force of Syria, so far as he had control over it, insufficient, made up his mind to enrol an army of mercenary soldiers. Mr. Grote has some good remarks on the multiplication of such soldiers in Greece after the Peloponnesian War, and the mischievous consequences which followed from it ('History of Greece,' vol. viii. p. 35). The practice rather increased than diminished after the time of Alexander.

having made his army greater than it was.] This was his purpose. It does not appear that he effected it. Before the time came for renewing his attack, the news of Epiphanes' death reached him, and he became involved in a civil war, first against Philip, whom Epiphanes had made regent shortly before his death (ch. vi. 55–63), and then against Demetrius (ch. vii. 1–4).

§ 3. JUDAS RECOVERS THE TEMPLE, PURIFIES AND RE-DEDICATES IT, AND RE-ESTABLISHES THE TEMPLE WORSHIP.

36–59. The repulse of Lysias at Bethzur changed the character of the struggle. Hitherto the patriots had stood almost entirely on the defensive, maintaining their independence by vast efforts, continually attacked, and contenting themselves with repulsing one attack after another. Now they felt that, for a time at any rate, they were safe from molestation, and might in their turn act on the offensive. The Syrian army was dispersed; they were masters of the whole open country; Syria could count as hers only the few strongholds in which she had left garrisons. Among these the most important—that to which the hearts and minds of all faithful Judæans turned—was Jerusalem. Though they might not be powerful enough at present to drive the Syrians out of the strong fortress which they had raised upon the western hill (ch. i. 33–36), it was quite possible that they might be able to recover and re-occupy the eastern or Temple eminence. The Temple worship was so much the centre and kernel of the Jewish religion, that naturally all hearts and minds were turned in this direction, and when Judas, interpreting the general feeling, exclaimed, "Our enemies are discomfited—let us go up to cleanse and dedicate the sanctuary," there was a universal acquiescence. The Temple site was occupied, the defilements removed, the place renovated, and, while the foreign garrison was kept at bay (v. 41), the whole area was cleansed, and the place re-dedicated (vv. 54–56). In the enthusiasm of the moment it was decreed that the "Feast of the Dedication" should be henceforth held each year for seven days, beginning with the 25th of the month Casleu —the day of the resumption of the morning and evening sacrifice (v. 59).

36. let us go up to cleanse . . . the sanctuary.] See ch. i. 46. The sanctuary is said to have been polluted, not only by the idolatrous altar erected on the top of the altar of burnt offering (ib. v. 54), but also by introducing a herd of swine into the Holy Place and slaughtering them within its precincts (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 5, § 4; Diod. Sic. xxxiv. 1). The entire sanctuary thus required cleansing.

and dedicate.] Zerubbabel had "dedicated" the house of God which he raised on the site of the Temple of Solomon after the return from the Captivity (Ezra vi. 16, 17), when the place had merely lain waste, without any positive desecration. Still more necessary was it, after such a pollution as that described in the preceding note, that the place should be purified and set apart for God afresh by a solemn act of re-dedication.

B. C. cir. 164.

37 Upon this all the host assembled themselves together, and went up into mount Sion.

38 And when they saw the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, and the gates burned up, and shrubs growing in the courts as in a forest, or in one of the mountains, yea, and the priests' chambers pulled down;

39 They rent their clothes, and made great lamentation, and cast ashes upon their heads, 40 And fell down flat to the ground upon their faces, and blew an alarm with the trumpets, and cried toward heaven. B. C. cir. 164.

41 Then Judas appointed certain men to fight against [f] those that were in the fortress, until he had cleansed the sanctuary. [f] ch. 1 34.

42 So he chose priests of blameless conversation, such as had pleasure in the law:

43 Who cleansed the sanctuary, and bare out the defiled stones into an unclean place.

37. into mount Sion.] "Mount Sion" here, as generally in the Maccabees, means the eastern hill, on some part of which the Temple was built. The modern Sion is the south-western hill. It is argued by some of the best modern authorities that the Sion of David—the true Sion—was neither of these, but a separate hill, north of the modern Sion, and nearly due west of the Temple. (See Col. Warren's paper in the 'Transactions of the Society of Bibl. Archæology' for 1881, pp. 311–315.)

38. the gates burned up.] The gates had been destroyed to lay the place open and prevent its being defensible. They seem to have been five in number. (See 2 Kings xi. 6, 19; 1 Chr. xxvi. 16; 2 Chr. xxiii. 5, 20.)

shrubs . . . as in a forest.] Rather, "as in a coppice." But the expression is exaggerated, since the site had not lain waste so much as four years.

the priests' chambers pulled down.] The term used here, παστοφόρια, is a rare one. There was a class of priests in Egypt, called by the Greeks παστοφόροι, whose business it was to carry the images of gods enclosed in small shrines (Diod. Sic. i. 29; Clem. Al. p. 253). The chambers in the Egyptian temples occupied by these priests were called παστοφόρια or παστοφορεῖα. After the Jews began to have chambers for priests in their temple (Neh. xiii. 5, 7, 9; Esdr. viii. 59), the word was applied to them, not very appropriately.

39. They rent their clothes, &c.] Comp. ch. iii. 47. The mourning was not carried out to such lengths as the former one, since then there seemed small hope of undoing the accursed work of the heathen, whereas now that work was about to pass wholly away.

40. fell down flat. In a sort of ecstasy of horror—not to worship, but to humiliate themselves.

and blew an alarm with the trumpets.] Rather, "and sounded with the signal trumpets." The silver trumpets of the Levitical law (Num. x. 2–10) were to be used for signals of all kinds, and were therefore called by the LXX. σάλπιγγες τῶν σημασιῶν, "trumpets of signals," or "signal trumpets" (Num. xxxi. 6). The phrase took the place of the Hebrew khatsôtsĕroth hat-tĕrû'ah, which, however, meant rather "trumpets of loud sound" than "trumpets of signal." The trumpets were used probably on this occasion to give the signal for a general prostration, to be followed by a "cry to heaven."

cried toward heaven.] See the comment on ch. iii. 50.

41. to fight against those that were in the fortress.] The stronghold, called ἄκρα by the author of this book, probably identical with the akra of Josephus, was still occupied by the Syrian garrison, which had seized and fortified it three years and a half before. (See ch. i. 33, 34.) Whether its position was due north of the Temple, as generally supposed, or due west, as Col. Warren argues, is perhaps doubtful.

until he had cleansed.] The object of Judas was not to take the fortress, but to occupy the attention of the garrison, and prevent them from making sallies to molest the workmen and others who were engaged in restoring and purifying the Temple. The fortress was not taken till twenty-three years later, under Simon. (See ch. xiii. 51.)

42. priests of blameless conversation.] Grimm suggests that the true meaning of ἀμώμους here is "free from legal defilement;" but the rendering of the A. V., which accords with the invariable use of the term in the New Testament (Eph. i. 4; v. 27; Col. i. 22; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 19; Jude 24; Rev. xiv. 5), is greatly preferable.

43. an unclean place.] Probably the valley of the Kidron, which was regarded as essentially impure. Here Asa had burnt the

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164. 44 And when as they consulted what to do with the altar of burnt offerings, which was profaned;

45 They thought it best to pull it down, lest it should be a reproach to them, because the heathen had defiled it: wherefore they pulled it down, 46 And laid up the stones in the [f] mountain of the temple in a convenient place, [g] until there should come a prophet to shew what should be done with them.

47 Then they took whole stones [h] according to the law, and built a new altar according to the former;

48 And made up the sanctuary, and the things that were within the temple, and hallowed the courts.

49 They made also new holy vessels, and into the temple they brought

[f] ch. 9. 27. & 14. 41.

[h] Exod. 20. 25. Deut. 27. 5. Josh. 8. 31.

idol of his mother, Maachah (1 Kings xv. 13); here Hezekiah had deposited the pollutions of Ahaz, and Josiah, the remains of the grove, altars, and idolatrous vessels of Manasseh (2 Kings xxiii. 4, 6, 12; 2 Chr. xxix. 16); here, according to Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' ix. 7, § 3), the wicked Athaliah had been executed. The "defiled stones" spoken of were probably those of which had been made the altar to Olympian Jove, built by the Syrians on the summit of the old altar of burnt-offerings. (See ch. i. 54, and note ad loc.)

44. they consulted what to do with the altar of burnt offerings.] This was the structure raised up by Zerubbabel after the return from the Captivity, as related in Ezra iii. 2, 3. It had been laid "upon the bases" of Solomon's altar, which the exiles were able to trace out, and was thus a square structure of thirty feet each way (2 Chr. iv. 1). In material, however, it differed from Solomon's altar, being of stone (v. 46), whereas his was of bronze. We can well understand that there might be a difference of opinion as to what it was best to do with the altar, which some might think that the sacrifices of nearly 400 years had made indelibly holy, while others might feel that the recent pollution had incurably desecrated it. The result of the "consultation" was a compromise. The altar was "pulled down;" but the stones composing it were carefully "laid up" within the Temple precincts.

45. They thought it best to pull it down.] Rather, "and the happy thought fell upon them to pull it down." ("Es fiel ihnen bei ein guter Rath"—Grimm.)

lest it should be a reproach to them.] Here we have the paramount motive. Had they dwelt by themselves they might have determined otherwise; but living among the heathen, they had to consider, not so much what was abstractedly right as what was expedient under the circumstances. Retention of the altar would have laid them open to reproach. Its destruction was the strongest possible protest against idolatry.

46. in the mountain of the temple.] I.e. "in some part of the temple hill."

in a convenient place.] Tradition said that the "place" selected was a room belonging to the high priest at the north-western corner of the Temple ('Middoth,' Mishna, iv. 46).

until there should come a prophet.] Comp. Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65; 1 Macc. xiv. 41. In the interval between the death of Malachi (ab. B.C. 400) and the coming of John the Baptist (ab. A.D. 27), the Jews were continually expecting a prophet to appear, with authority to settle all matters of religion on which there was any doubt. The general expectation was that Elijah would rise from the dead and "restore all things" (Matt. xvii. 11); but some expected Jeremiah (ib. xiv. 14); while others merely supposed that God would not—could not—long leave his "peculiar people" without an inspired guide to direct them. The expectation did not die away as time went on, but rather grew in force, and became a definite anticipation of the coming of "Messiah the Prince" before the Baptist came forth from his seclusion.

47. they took whole stones according to the law.] By "whole stones" are meant stones in their natural condition, untouched by the saw or the graving-tool, such as are commanded to be used in Ex. xx. 25; Deut. xxvii. 5.

built a new altar.] Literally, "built the altar anew." Being on the same site, it was still regarded as the same altar.

48. And made up the sanctuary.] Rather, "built up." The walls had probably suffered wanton injury in places.

and the things that were within the temple.] Rather, "and the inner parts of the temple"—i.e. the walls and other partitions which divided the Temple into portions. These too had suffered damage, and required repairs.

and hallowed the courts.] I.e. removed all defilements from them, and perhaps purified them with "the water of separation" (Num. xix. 9–21), as Grimm supposes.

49. new holy vessels.] "Furniture" is intended, rather than "vessels." The original furniture of the Temple had consisted of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164. the candlestick, and the altar of burnt offerings, and of incense, and the table.

50 And upon the altar they burned incense, and the lamps that were upon the candlestick they lighted, that they might give light in the temple.

51 Furthermore they set the loaves upon the table, and ‖spread out the veils, and finished all the works which they had begun to make.

‖ Or, spread abroad the hangings, or, hanged up the veils.

52 Now on the five and twentieth day of the ninth month, which is called the month Casleu, in the hundred forty and eighth year, they rose up betimes in the morning, B. C. cir. 164.

53 And offered sacrifice according to the law upon the new altar of burnt offerings, which they had made.

54 Look, at what time and what day the heathen had profaned it, even in that was it dedicated with songs, and citherns, and harps, and cymbals.

55 Then all the people fell upon their faces, worshipping and praising the God of heaven, who had given them good success.

four objects:—1. The ark, with the cherubim and the mercy-seat; 2. The golden candlestick, or lamp-stand; 3. The table for the shewbread; and 4. The altar of incense. The ark and mercy-seat appear to have been destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Esd. x. 22), and the second temple had not even any counterparts of them (Joseph. 'Bel. Jud.' v. 5, § 5; Tacit. 'Hist.' v. 9). Hence the pieces of furniture had been reduced to three. These, having been carried off by the Syro-Macedonians (ch. i. 21, 22), were now replaced by new constructions. According to the Talmud, the candlestick now made was not of gold, but of iron cased with wood (Derembourg, 'History of Palestine,' p. 54).

the altar of burnt offerings, and of incense.] This is the reading of the Aldine edition, and of several MSS. It is, however, manifestly erroneous. The "altar of burnt-offerings" could not be "brought into the Temple," since it was a solid stone structure built in the outer court (v. 47); nor could there have been any occasion to mention it a second time. Most manuscripts, including the Codex Alexandrinus, read τὸ θυσιαστήριον τῶν θυμιαμάτων, "the altar of incense," omitting the words ὁλοκαυτωμάτων καί. On the "altar of incense," or the "golden altar," see note on ch. i. 21.

50. they burned incense, and the lamps . . . they lighted.] Compare Ex. xl. 25, 27. They resumed each of the practices disused during the time of desolation.

51. they set the loaves upon the table.] The twelve loaves of the shewbread, which were the continued thank-offering of the twelve tribes of Israel. (Comp. Ex. xxv. 30; xl. 23; Lev. xxiv. 5–9.)

spread out the veils.] By "the veils" we must understand:—1. The veil proper, which separated between the "Holy Place" and the "Holy of Holies;" and 2. The "hanging" at the door of the "Holy Place," which divided it from the porch (Ex. xxvi. 36; xxxvi. 37).

52. on the five and twentieth day of the ninth month.] Exactly three years from the date of the first sacrifice on the idol-altar set up by the Syro-Macedonians. (See ch. i. 54, 59; and comp. 2 Macc. x. 5.)

they rose up betimes.] They were impatient of delay—eager to witness the rekindling of the flame upon the altar, which was the symbol of the national life, and the renewal of the daily sacrifice, which was the sign of the nation's self-dedication to God. According to the writer of the Second Book, the sacrificial fire was obtained by striking two stones together for the purpose (2 Macc. x. 3). Light so obtained was reckoned holy, as coming straight from nature, i.e. from God.

53. offered sacrifice according to the law.] I.e. "offered the morning sacrifice, a lamb of the first year, with its appointed meat-offering and drink-offering." (See Ex. xxix. 38–40.)

54. Look, at what time, &c.] There is no "Look" in the original. The fact is simply narrated, that the dedication took place at the same time, or rather "season"—i.e. in the month Chisleu—and on the same day as the profanation. Judas, no doubt, arranged that so it should be.

with songs, and citherns, and harps, and cymbals.] I.e. with the recognised musical service of the sanctuary, where the psalmody was usually accompanied by the harp, the cymbal, and the cithern or psaltery. (See 1 Chr. xxv. 6; 2 Chr. v. 12.) The cithern is the German zither, a sort of guitar or viol. (Comp. ch. xiii. 51.)

55. all the people fell upon their faces.] I.e. prostrated themselves in adoration.

praising the God of heaven, who had given them good success.] Rather, "praising up to heaven" (i.e. lauding to the skies) "him

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164.

56 And so they kept the dedication of the altar eight days, and offered burnt offerings with gladness, and sacrificed the sacrifice of ‖deliverance and praise.

‖ Or, peace offerings.

57 They decked also the forefront of the temple with crowns of gold, and with shields; and the gates and the chambers they ‖renewed, and ‖hanged doors upon them.

‖ Or, dedicated.

‖ Or, made doors for them.

58 Thus was there very great gladness among the people, for that the reproach of the heathen was put away.

59 Moreover Judas and his brethren with the whole congregation of Israel ordained, that the days of the dedication of the altar should be kept in their season from year to year by the space of eight days, from the five and twentieth day of the month Casleu, with mirth and gladness.

B. C. cir. 164.

60 At that time also they builded up the mount Sion with high walls and strong towers round about, lest the Gentiles should come and tread it down, [r] as they had done before.

[r] ch. 1. 31.

61 And they set there a garrison to keep it, and fortified Bethsura to who had given them good success." With his usual reticence, the writer keeps back the name of God, while making his reference to Him sufficiently apparent.

56. they kept the dedication of the altar eight days.] The word translated "dedication" is ἐγκαινισμός, which serves to connect this occasion with the permanent ἐγκαίνια, or "Feast of the Dedication" of the New Testament (John x. 22). It was this occasion which that feast of the mid-winter commemorated. As Solomon's dedication feast had lasted "eight days" (1 Kings viii. 63–66), so Judas fixed the same term for the duration of his.

and sacrificed the sacrifice of deliverance and praise.] Rather, "and sacrificed a sacrifice of peace-offerings and thanksgiving." Comp. Lev. vii. 11, 12, where the LXX. use the same expression—θυσία σωτηρίου and αἰνέσεως.

57. They decked also the forefront of the temple with crowns of gold.] There was no direct precedent for this in Jewish practice. It was rather analogous to the heathen ornamentation of temples and public buildings with garlands and festoons at times of public rejoicing.

with shields.] Literally, "small shields"—in imitation, probably, of the golden shields of Solomon (1 Kings x. 17), which Shishak carried off (ib. xiv. 26). Philo tells us that in Alexandria the Jewish synagogues were adorned with shields ('Leg. ad Caium,' p. 994).

the gates and the chambers they renewed.] Rather, "they consecrated." On the "chambers," see the comment on v. 38.

59. Judas . . . ordained, that the days . . . should be kept.] The festival of the ἐγκαίνια maintained its place to the last days of Jewish national existence. It was celebrated nearly in the same manner as the Feast of Tabernacles, with festal processions, in which branches of trees, especially of the palm, green even in mid-winter, were borne, and psalms were sung, by the worshippers (2 Macc. x. 6, 7). Josephus says that in his time its common name was "the Feast of Lights" (τὰ Φῶτα); and at a later period there was certainly a custom of illuminating private houses with lamps or candles during its continuance. It is conjectured that the great golden candelabra in the court of the Temple, which were lighted on the first night of the Feast of Tabernacles, were also lighted on the first night of this feast (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 312); but there is no historical evidence of this practice.

§ 4. DEFENSIVE MEASURES OF JUDAS—THE TEMPLE HILL, AND THE CITY OF BETHZUR FORTIFIED.

60. they builded up the mount Sion with high walls and strong towers round about.] As the Acra, and indeed the whole of Jerusalem except the Temple hill, remained in the hands of the Syrians, who maintained a strong garrison in the place, Judas felt it to be necessary now, for the first time in Jewish history, to fortify with walls and towers the entire Temple circuit. Hitherto, only the eastern side, which coincided with the outer circuit of the city, had been thus guarded from attack. From this time till B.C. 142 the two Jerusalems stood one over against the other, watchful and hostile, like the Latin and the Sabine Romes on the Quirinal and the Palatine.

tread it down.] I.e. "ruin it"—"destroy it." Comp. ch. iii. 45.

61. fortified Bethsura.] A wise measure. The possession of a strong place in the hill-country south of Jerusalem was of the greatest importance, more especially as the Idumæans were hostile (ch. v. 1–3), and Scanned by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164. preserve it; that the people might have a defence against Idumea.

CHAPTER V.

3 Judas smiteth the children of Esau, Bean, and Ammon. 17 Simon is sent into Galilee. 25 The exploits of Judas in Galaad. 51 He destroyeth Ephron, for denying him to pass through it. 56 Divers, that in Judas' absence would fight with their enemies, are slain.

cir. 163. NOW when the nations round about heard that the altar was built, and the sanctuary renewed as before, it displeased them very much.

2 Wherefore they thought to destroy the generation of Jacob that was among them, and thereupon they began to slay and destroy the people. B. C. cir. 163.

3 Then Judas fought against the children of Esau in Idumea at ‖Arabattine, because they besieged Israel: and he gave them a great overthrow, and abated their courage, and took their spoils. ‖ Or, Arabatthane, or, Arabattan, or, Akrabattine.

4 Also he remembered the ‖injury of the children of ‖Bean, who had been a snare and an offence unto the people, in that they lay in wait for them in the ways. ‖ Or, malice. ‖ Or, Hakan, Gen. 36. 27. Numb. 33. 31, 32.

5 He shut them up therefore in the towers, and encamped against them, and destroyed them utterly, might attack the patriots upon the south, while they were engaged against the Syrians on the north.

to preserve it.] These words seem superfluous. They are omitted in some of the best MSS., and in the Syriac Version. Probably their original intrusion was an error of repetition by a scribe. If we retain them, we must understand that Bethsura was occupied in order that from it a watch might be kept on the Temple fortress.

CHAPTER V.

§ 1. Offensive Measures of Judas against Idumæa, the Children of Bean, and Ammon.

1–8. Having recovered the Temple site, restored the edifice, and strongly fortified the entire hill, Judas felt himself strong enough to resume his offensive operations, and chastise the tribes in his immediate neighbourhood which had recently lent their aid to the Syrians. Of these the most important were the Idumæans or Edomites, "the children of Bean," and the Ammonites. The year B.C. 163 seems to have been employed in three campaigns against these three enemies.

1. it displeased them very much.] Rather, "They were greatly enraged." The spiritual worship in the Temple at Jerusalem was a perpetual protest against the licentious idolatries of the neighbouring tribes, and was therefore the object of their constant hatred. They had imagined for three years that it was swept away for ever. Naturally, its re-establishment called forth their anger.

2. Wherefore they thought to destroy, &c.] A deliberate design to exterminate all Israelites, within their borders, seems to be charged upon them. Whether there was really such an intention, may perhaps be doubted.

the generation of Jacob that was among them.] I.e. "the Israelites who dwelt in their midst." It must be borne in mind, that, amid the general confusion, the tribes mentioned had probably encroached upon Israelite territory.

they began to slay and destroy the people.] Rather, "among the people." They vented their vexation at what had occurred by putting certain Israelites to death.

3. at Arabattine.] Rather, "Acrabattine." The place is reasonably identified with the "Akrabbim" of the Canonical Books (Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3; Judg. i. 36), which lay south or south-west of the Dead Sea, in the Idumæan territory.

they besieged Israel.] Rather, "blocked Israel in"—i.e. cramped her, confined her, were a continual menace to her borders. See note on ch. iv. 29.

4. the injury of the children of Bean.] Rather, "the malice," or "wickedness." It is not any single act, but a continuous state of hostility, that is pointed at. The "Beni Bean" are not elsewhere mentioned under this name; but perhaps they are identical with the Mehunim or Maonites (מְעוֹן or מְעוֹנִים) of the Canonical Books, since ב and מ are constantly confused. The Maonites are mentioned as enemies of Israel in Judg. x. 12; 2 Chr. xxvi. 7; and (perhaps) in 2 Chr. xx. 1.

5. He shut them up in the towers.] I.e. "in their towers"—in the strongholds from which they were wont to issue on their raids.

destroyed them utterly.] Literally, "devoted them," but in the sense of "devoting to destruction," which is a common meaning of ἀναθεματίζω in the Septuagint version, where it replaces the Hebrew hakhărêm.

B. C. cir. 163. and burned the towers of that place with fire, and all that were therein.

6 Afterward he passed over to the children of Ammon, where he found a mighty power, and much people, with Timotheus their captain.

7 So he fought many battles with them, till at length they were discomfited before him; and he smote them. B. C. cir. 163.

8 And when he had taken Jazar, with the towns belonging thereto, he returned into Judea.

burned the towers of that place.] As no "place" has been mentioned, it seems impossible that the reading can be sound. Αὐτῶν, instead of αὐτῆς, is what we should have expected; but it seems unlikely that any copyist would have blundered in that case. Perhaps a city was mentioned, the name of which has been corrupted into αὐτῆς.

6. he passed over to the children of Ammon.] I.e. he crossed the Jordan, and proceeded to attack the Ammonites, who held the country east and north-east of the Dead Sea, between the Arnon and the Jabbok. The Ammonites, like the Edomites, had always been enemies of Israel, though not very formidable enemies. They joined with Moab in the attempt to induce Balaam to curse Israel (Deut. xxiii. 4); they invaded the Israelite territory in the time of Jephthah (Jud. xi. 4, 12), and again in the days of Saul (1 Sam. xi. 1–3). They brought about the great confederacy against David, which was crushed by Joab (2 Sam. x. 6–19). In conjunction with the Moabites and Edomites, they made an unprovoked attack upon Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 1–3); they frequently invaded the Transjordanic region under Uzziah (Am. i. 13); they had wars with Jotham (2 Chr. xxvii. 5). When Nebuchadnezzar was threatening Jerusalem with destruction, they joined his forces (2 Kings xxiv. 2). When Nehemiah received his commission to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, the Ammonite, Tobiah, was among the most violent of his opponents (Neh. ii. 10, 19; iv. 3, 7; vi. 1, 12, 17–19).

much people.] Justin Martyr says ('Dialog. c. Tryphon.' p. 347, c.) that the Ammonites were even in his day a numerous people (πολὺ πλῆθος). Josephus calls the force which they now brought into the field "multitudinous" (πολυάνθρωπος). We have no exact estimate of the population; but the country is rich and capable of supporting large numbers (see Tristram, 'Land of Israel,' p. 541 et seqq.).

Timotheus their captain.] This Greek name is a novel feature in Ammonite history. We must suppose Timotheus to have been either a Syro-Macedonian official, exercising an authority under the Syrian crown, to which the Ammonites were subject, or a soldier of fortune whom the Ammonites had invited to take the command of their troops. It is possible, no doubt, but scarcely probable that he was a genuine Ammonite with a Greek name (Grimm).

7. till at length they were discomfited.] Rather, "and they were discomfited in each." The triple use of the aorist implies that, as often as he engaged them, so often were they discomfited and smitten.

8. when he had taken Jazar.] Jazar, Jazer, or Ja'azer, was a town of the Trans-Jordanic region, in the district assigned to Gad (Josh. xiii. 25). It was taken by Moses from the Amorites in the war with Sihon (Num. xxi. 32), and destroyed, but afterwards rebuilt by the Gadites (ib. xxxii. 35). The country around was "a land for cattle," very rich and fertile (ib. xxxii. 1), and suited for the cultivation of the vine (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32). Jazar became a Levitical city, when the Levites received their inheritance (Josh. xxi. 39). It is usually mentioned in conjunction with Heshbon, from which it was about 14 miles distant (Hieronym. 'Onomast.'). The site is scarcely sufficiently identified at present, but is thought to be at Szîr or Seir, near the source of the Wady Seir, which flows into the Jordan. Szîr is about 12 miles nearly due north of Heshbon, and 9 west by south of Rabbath-Ammon.

with the towns belonging thereto.] Literally, "with her daughters." The expression is common in the Hebrew Scriptures (Num. xxi. 25, 32; Josh. xv. 45, 47; Judg. xi. 26; 1 Chr. xviii. 1; Neh. xi. 25-31; &c.); but the Greek translators do not often render it literally. The Complutensian Codex has it, however, several times in Neh. xi. It is exactly analogous to the very widely used expression—"mother city." The "towns," or "villages," dependent on Jazar seem to have been of unusual importance. (See Num. xxxii. 35.)

§ 2. Retaliatory Movements on the part of the Heathen—1. In Gilead; 2. In Galilee.

9–15. Judas, after his three successful attacks upon his neighbours, had "returned into Judea" (v. 8), and dismissed his army, which scattered itself over the territory (v. 16), expecting to enjoy a period of repose. Of this state of things, the enemies of the Jews at once proceeded to take advantage

B. C. cir. 163.

9 Then the heathen that were at Galaad assembled themselves together against the Israelites that were in their quarters, to destroy them; but they fled to the fortress of Dathema,

10 And sent letters unto Judas and his brethren, The heathen that are round about us are assembled together against us to destroy us:

11 And they are preparing to come and take the fortress whereunto we are fled, Timotheus being captain of their host.

12 Come now therefore, and deliver us from their hands, for many of us are slain:

B. C. cir. 163.

13 Yea, all our brethren that were in the places of ‖Tobie are put to death: their wives and their children also they have carried away captives, and borne away their stuff; and they have destroyed there about a thousand men.

‖ Or, Tubin.

14 While these letters were yet reading, behold, there came other messengers from Galilee with their clothes rent, who reported on this wise,

15 And said, They of Ptolemais, and of Tyrus, and Sidon, and all

1. In Gilead. Timotheus having rallied his troops, crossed the Jabbok, and invaded Gilead, where many Jews who had taken no part in the Maccabean insurrection were quietly residing. Falling upon them unawares, he slew some, and drove the others to take refuge in their strongholds, such as Bozrah, Bosor, Alema, Casphor, Maked, and Ashtoreth-Carnaim (v. 26). 2. In Galilee. Here the Judæans were attacked by the Gentiles who were mixed up with them, in conjunction with the inhabitants of Tyre, Sidon, and Ptolemaïs, or Acre. The object was to crush the scattered members of the Judæan race, who, if let alone, might be expected ultimately to join the patriots.

9. the heathen that were at Galaad.] Rather, "in Gilead." Gilead is a district, not a city. It is the region north of Moab and Ammon, on the east side of the Jordan, between the Jabbok and the Hieromax. It is "a rich pasture land, with shady forests, and copious streams" ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. i. p. 699)—one of the most fertile portions of Palestine.

that were in their quarters.] There are two readings, ἐν τοῖς ὁρίοις, and ἐπὶ τοῖς ὁρίοις. The former is with reason preferred by our translators, since the Israelites attacked were evidently scattered over the whole country, and not merely "upon its borders."

they fled to the fortress of Dathema.] The readings vary between Δάθεμα, Δάμεθα, and Διάθεμα. Some have supposed Ramoth-Gilead to be meant, since the Syriac has "Ramtha;" but this is very uncertain. We must regard Dathema as a site still not identified.

13. in the places of Tobie.] The Syriac has "Tubin," and so the Vulgate. The MSS. vary between Τωβίου and Τουβίου. It is conjectured with reason that "the land of Tôb," which adjoined on Gilead (Judg. xi. 3), is intended; and that to the same place belonged the "Jews called Tubieni" of 2 Macc. xii. 17. If the same place is alluded to in the "Ish-Tob" ("men of Tob") mentioned in 2 Sam. x. 6, we may regard the name as attaching to the region called afterwards Golan or Gaulonitis.

about a thousand men.] Literally, "about a chiliarchy of men;" but the word χιλιαρχία seems to be used here as a mere synonym for χίλιοι. It is, as Grimm says, "rein numerisch."

15. They of Ptolemaïs.] When Palestine, at the death of Alexander, was assigned to Ptolemy Lagi, together with Egypt, Accho, its best port, received the name of Ptolemaïs, which it retained until the time of Herod the Great, when the name was lost in that of his new city, Cæsarea. The site, at the northern extremity of a wide bay, and in the centre of a considerable plain, commanding moreover the coast road, together with that which led inland into the great plain of Palestine—that of Esdraelon—was very important, and naturally led to Accho becoming, after the downfall of Tyre, the chief seaport of Phœnicia, and indeed of Syria generally. Its position in the present list shews its superiority over Tyre and Sidon, while the position assigned it in the later history (ch. v. 55; x. 1, 58; xii. 48; xiii. 12; 2 Macc. xiii. 24, 25) sufficiently indicates the value which was set on it by all parties. The place has now recovered its old name, and is known as "Acre" to Europeans, as "Akka" to its inhabitants.

of Tyrus.] Tyre, though almost entirely destroyed by Alexander (Q. Curt., 'Hist. Alex.' iv. 4), very quickly rose from her ashes, and recovered a certain amount of prosperity. She played, however, a very secondary part in the history of the Maccabee period.

and Sidon.] Sidon was a flourishing com-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. Galilee of the Gentiles, are assembled together against us to consume us.

16 Now when Judas and the people heard these words, there assembled a great congregation together, to consult what they should do for their brethren, that were in trouble, and assaulted of them.

17 Then said Judas unto Simon his brother, Choose thee out men, and go and deliver thy brethren that are in Galilee, for I and Jonathan my brother will go into the country of Galaad. B. C. cir. 163.

18 So he left Joseph the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, captains of the people, with the remnant of the host in Judea to keep it.

19 Unto whom he gave commandment, saying, Take ye the charge of this people, and see that ye make not war against the heathen until the time that we come again.

mercial town during the Maccabee and Roman periods, but had little military importance, and is seldom mentioned by the historians.

Galilee of the Gentiles.] Comp. Is. ix. 1, where a similar expression is used. Israelites and Gentiles seem to have been always mixed together in Galilee, where "the people dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians" (Judg. xviii. 7). The near neighbourhood of Phœnicia and Syria tended to produce a mixed population. Tiglath-pileser carried off great numbers of the Israelites in the eighth century B.C. (2 Kings xv. 29), and the later Assyrians replaced them by a foreign population. It is more surprising that the Jews, after their return from the Captivity, obtained a certain hold on the remote Galilee, while the nearer Samaria remained separate and hostile, than that the Gentile inhabitants continued numerous.

§ 3. JUDAS DIVIDES HIS FORCES, AND, LEAVING SOME TO DEFEND JUDÆA, SENDS HIS BROTHER SIMON TO HELP THE GALILEANS, WHILE HE HIMSELF GOES TO ASSIST THE JEWS IN GILEAD.

16–54. Judas now for the first time felt himself strong enough to divide his forces. Leaving two captains, Joseph and Azarias, in Judæa, with strict orders to remain on the defensive, he sent his brother Simon, with 3000 men, to the assistance of the Galilean Jews, while he himself, with 8000 men, marched into Gilead (vv. 16–20). Simon's campaign is not related at any length. He gained several victories, chased the enemy to the gates of Ptolemaïs, and took advantage of his successes to remove the Galilean Jews into Judæa (vv. 21–23). The campaign of Judas is given in greater detail. Assisted by an Arab tribe (v. 25), he relieved the towns into which the Jews had been driven, one after another; defeated Timotheus himself before Dathema, and again near Raphon (vv. 37–43); took Ashtoreth-Carnaim (v. 44) and Ephron (vv. 46–51); and returned into Judæa with much spoil, and accompanied by the Jews of Gilead, whom he proposed to settle in Judæa (v. 45). The return was celebrated by a thanksgiving festival at Jerusalem (v. 54).

16. there assembled a great congregation together.] The word translated "congregation" is ἐκκλησία, which in Greek political science means "an assembly of the people for legislative or deliberative purposes." We must conclude that Judas did not rule autocratically, but called "assemblies" from time to time, to deliberate and determine what should be done. A larger body than the Sanhedrim is certainly intended.

assaulted of them.] I.e. "attacked by the heathen." (See v. 15.)

17. Then said Judas unto Simon his brother.] Simon had been nominated by Mattathias to the second position among the five brethren (ch. ii. 65, 66), but as counsellor rather than as general. Still, Judas thought it befitting, as soon as the command was to be divided, that Simon should occupy the post next in importance to his own.

Choose thee out men.] As Simon was to have the smaller force (v. 20), he was allowed to select the troops which he thought the best.

I and Jonathan.] The selection of Jonathan by Judas as joint-commander with himself shews the confidence felt in his military ability. Hence, on the death of Judas, Jonathan was appointed to succeed him (ch. ix. 28–30).

18. he left Joseph . . . and Azarias, captains of the people.] Rather, "he left Joseph and Azarias to be rulers of the people," i.e. to have the chief authority. They would, of course, combine the chief military with the chief civil power. Hence, in v. 56, they are called "captains of the host" (ἄρχοντες τῆς δυνάμεως). Neither Joseph nor Azarias obtain mention elsewhere than in this chapter.

to keep it.] Or, "to guard it."

19. see that ye make not war against the

B. C. cir. 163.

20 Now unto Simon were given three thousand men to go into Galilee, and unto Judas eight thousand men for the country of Galaad.

21 Then went Simon into Galilee, where he fought many battles with the heathen, so that the heathen were discomfited by him.

22 And he pursued them unto the gate of Ptolemais; and there were slain of the heathen about three thousand men, whose spoils he took.

‖ Or, captive Jews.

23 And ‖those that were in Galilee, and in Arbattis, with their wives and their children, and all that they had, took he away with him, and brought them into Judea with great joy.

B. C. cir. 163.

24 Judas Maccabeus also and his brothen Jonathan went over Jordan, and travelled three days' journey in the wilderness,

25 Where they met with the Nabathites, who came unto them in a peaceable manner, and told them every thing that had happened to their brethren in the land of Galaad:

‖ Or, Bosorra.

26 And how that many of them were shut up in ‖Bosora, and Bosor, and Alema, ‖Casphor, Maked, and heathen.] For their transgression of this command, see vv. 55–62.

‖ Or, Chascor, or, Casphon, as ver. 36.

20. three thousand . . . eight thousand.] The continually increasing strength of the patriots is here seen. At Emmaus the fighting men were but 3000 (ch. iv. 6); at Bethsura they were 10,000 (ib. v. 29); they must now have considerably exceeded 13,000. (Compare v. 60.)

21. the heathen were discomfited by him.] Literally, "before his face"—a common Hebraism.

22. the gate of Ptolemaïs.] Ptolemaïs had, no doubt, more than one gate. "The gate" here is that to which the enemy fled, probably the eastern gate. There is no sufficient reason for adopting the reading of a few MSS., τῶν πύλεων, instead of τῆς πύλης.

23. in Arbattis.] Rather, "in Arbatta" (ἐν Ἀρβάττοις). The readings vary greatly, including Ἀρβάκτοις (Cod. Alex.), Ἀρβατόνοις and Ἀδραβύττοις. It has been suggested that the region intended is probably that called Acrabatiné by Josephus ('Bell. Jud.' iii. 3, § 4. &c.), which lay between Neapolis and Jericho ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. i. p. 101); but this is much too far to the south. "Arbatta" must have adjoined on Galilee. Ewald's conjecture that it was the low land through which the Jordan flows into the Sea of Tiberias ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 314, note, E. T.) is not improbable.

25. they met with the Nabathites.] Rather, "the Nabatæans" (τοῖς Ναβαταίοις). The Nabatæans, or Nabathæans, are a well-known Semitic tribe; whether Syrians or Arabians is disputed. Alexander Polyhistor mentions them as included among the desert tribes conquered by David (Fr. 18); but they first shew themselves in contemporary history when they are reduced to subjection by Sennacherib ('Ancient Monarchies,' vol. ii. p. 430). About 40 years later they appear as independent, and assist an Arabian monarch in his war with Sennacherib's grandson, Asshur-bani-pal (Smith, 'Annals of Asshur-bani-pal,' pp. 264–295). Diodorus tells us that they were attacked by Antigonus, about B.C. 311, and again a few years later, but defended themselves successfully (Diod. Sic. xix. 44–48). At that time, and later also, their head-quarters were the neighbourhood of Petra. Judas appears to have fallen in with them in Gilead, which may be accounted for by their nomadic habits. The whole of Northern Arabia seems to have been at all times traversed by their swarms, which passed from the Lower Euphrates to the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea without fear of meeting a superior. The readiness of the Nabathæans to assist the Israelites (compare ch. ix. 35) may have arisen mainly from the hope of plunder; but it may have rested in part on the tradition of relationship, since the supposed progenitor of the Nabathæans was Nebaioth, the eldest of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13).

26. Bosora and Bosor.] These are evidently two different places. Bosora is reasonably identified with the Hebrew Bozrah (Is. lxiii. 1), the modern El-Buseireh. Bosor is perhaps the Bezor of Josh. xx. 8, which was a Levitical city on the east side of Jordan in the Mishor or down country.

Alema.] "Alema" is conjectured to be the Beer-Elim of Is. xv. 8—"the fount of the terebinth-trees." Of its position nothing is known.

Casphor.] Josephus has "Casphôma;" the Vulgate, "Casbon;" several MSS., "Chascor." In v. 36 of the present chapter, the name is given as Casphon, which is a possible representation of the Hebrew "Heshbon." The site cannot be fixed, unless Heshbon is intended.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. Carnaim; all these cities are strong and great:

27 And that they were shut up in the rest of the cities of the country of Galaad, and that against to morrow ‖ they had appointed to bring their host against the forts, and to take them, and to destroy them all in one day.

‖ Or, the heathen.

28 Hereupon Judas and his host turned suddenly by the way of the wilderness unto ‖ Bosora; and when he had won the city, he slew all the males with the edge of the sword, and took all their spoils, and burned the city with fire. B. C. cir. 163.

‖ Or, Bosor.

29 From whence he removed by night, and went till he came to the fortress.

30 And betimes in the morning they ‖ looked up, and, behold, there was an innumerable people bearing ladders and other engines of war, to take the fortress: for ‖ they assaulted them.

‖ Gr. lift up their eyes.

‖ Or, the heathen assaulted the Jews.

31 When Judas therefore saw that the battle was begun, and that the cry of the city went up to heaven, with trumpets, and a great sound, Maked.] For "Maked" we have "Maged" in v. 36; but the MSS. have Μακέδ in both places. The town is wholly unknown.

Carnaim.] This is probably the place called Ashtoreth-Karnaim ("Venus of the Two Horns") in Genesis xiv. 5. It must have been an old Phœnician, or, at any rate, Syrian settlement, dedicated to the "Dea Syra," who was called Ashtoreth (Astarté, Ishtar) by some of the Semitic races, Atargatis or Derketo by others. The epithet "Karnaim" probably refers to the mode in which the goddess was represented in her temple at the place in question (v. 44), the crescent moon being placed on her head, and thus giving it the appearance of being "horned." The site is uncertain, but may perhaps be identified with the El-Kurnein of Robinson ('Researches in Palestine,' vol. iii. App. ii. p. 168).

27. against the forts.] The "forts" are evidently the towns previously mentioned—viz. Bosora, Bosor, Alema, Casphor, Maked, Carnaim (v. 26), and Dathema (v. 9). The design "to destroy them all in one day" was probably connected with the notion of a surprise.

28. unto Bosora.] The MSS. vary between "Bosor," "Bosorra," and "Bossora." The "Bosora" of v. 26 is probably intended, since "Bosor" is mentioned as captured in v. 36.

he slew all the males.] We must understand all those who were not Jews. The cities of Gilead appear to have had at this time a mixed population—in part, Jewish, in part heathen. (See also v. 35.) The Jews were threatened by an armed force outside the cities, and also by the heathen population within them. Judas, after all his successes, felt it safest to withdraw the Jews from Gilead into Judæa (v. 45).

29. and went till he came to the fortress.] "The fortress" is clearly Dathema, which Judas was about to relieve, when the information of the Nabathæans induced him to turn aside from his route, and make an attack on Bosora (vv. 25–28). It appears to have been within a night's march of Bosora.

30. And betimes in the morning they looked up, &c.] Literally, "And it was dawn, and they lifted up their eyes, and beheld much people, which could not be numbered."

bearing ladders.] I.e. scaling-ladders. Their use appears in the Assyrian sculptures from the time of Asshur-nazir-pal (B.C. 880), and in those of Egypt from the earlier portion of the nineteenth dynasty, about B.C. 1400. They are not mentioned in the Canonical Scriptures; but the Greeks employed them in the Peloponnesian War (Thuc. ii. 20), and the Romans in the Second Punic War (Liv. xxvi. 45).

other engines of war.] There is no "other" in the original, since "ladders" scarcely come under the denomination of "warlike engines." The machines intended are probably the battering-ram, the catapult, and the ballista, all of which were well known to the Greeks long before the time of Alexander, and were commonly used in sieges. The Assyrians and Babylonians employed them in all their great wars. The Egyptian "engines" were simpler and less effective.

for they assaulted them.] Rather, "were assaulting them"—were beginning the attack, not aware of the near vicinity of Judas. Compare v. 27.

31. with trumpets.] The heathen had trumpets no less than the Israelites. We see them represented in the Egyptian and Assyrian sculptures (Rosellini, 'Mon. Storici,' pl. xliv. 3; Layard, 'Monuments of Nineveh,' 2nd Series, pl. 15); and we hear of them as in use among the Greeks and Romans from a

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

32 He said unto his host, Fight this day for your brethren.

33 So he went forth behind them in three companies, who sounded their trumpets, and cried with prayer.

34 Then the host of Timotheus, knowing that it was Maccabeus, fled from him: wherefore he smote them with a great slaughter; so that there were killed of them that day about eight thousand men.

35 This done, Judas turned aside to Maspha; and after he had assaulted it, he took it, and slew all the males therein, and received the spoils thereof, and burnt it with fire.

36 From thence went he, and took [a] Casphon, Maged, Bosor, and the other cities of the country of Galaad.

[a] See ver. 26.

37 After these things gathered Timotheus another host, and encamped against Raphon beyond the brook.

B. C. cir. 163.

38 So Judas sent men to espy the host, who brought him word, saying, All the heathen that be round about us are assembled unto them, even a very great host.

39 He hath also hired the Arabians to help them, and they have pitched their tents beyond the brook, ready to come and fight against thee. Upon this Judas went to meet them.

40 Then Timotheus said unto the captains of his host, When Judas and his host come near the brook, if he pass over first unto us, we shall not be able to withstand him; for he will mightily prevail against us:

41 But if he be afraid, and camp beyond the river, we shall go over unto him, and prevail against him.

very early date. Their most common employment was in war, either for giving signals or for cheering men on to the attack. (See Hom. 'Il.' xviii. 219, xxi. 388; Dionys. Hal. iv. 17, &c.)

33. he went forth behind them.] Rather, "after them"—i.e. in pursuit of the assailants, following upon their footsteps.

in three companies.] After the example of Gideon (Judg. vii. 16).

35. Maspha.] "Maspha" is probably "Mizpeh of Gilead" (Judg. xi. 29), the city of Jephthah the Gileadite (ib. 34). It is curious that Josephus should give the name as Mallé, an utterly unknown place ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 8, § 3). Mizpeh of Gilead is still an undiscovered site.

he slew all the males.] See note on v. 28.

36. Casphon.] Called "Casphor" in v. 26—perhaps Heshbon.

Maged.] No doubt the "Maked" of v. 26—an unknown, and apparently an unimportant place, the capture of which is not mentioned by Josephus.

Bosor.] See the first note on v. 26.

37. Raphon.] Pliny mentions a "Raphana" as one of the ten cities included in the "Decapolis" of his day, which lay south of the Sea of Galilee, and east of the Jordan. The site has still to be discovered.

beyond the brook.] Literally, "the ravine" or "water-course." The streams of Gilead are for the most part perennial (Tristram, 'Bible Places,' p. 322); but this one, near Raphon, is characterised as a χειμάῤῥους, or stream running only in the winter. Ewald supposes that at the time it not only carried water, but was "a good deal swollen" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 314); but there is no statement to this effect, either in the First Book of the Maccabees or in Josephus.

39. He hath also hired the Arabians to help them.] Arab tribes will join any standard under which they have a good hope of success, and of the booty that follows success. They are quite willing to be subsidized. Arabians had joined with Ammonites in opposing the efforts of Nehemiah to raise Jerusalem from a humble to a high position (Neh. iv. 7). They now once more took service under an Ammonite leader (v. 6) with the same object.

Upon this Judas went to meet them.] Upon the report of his spies, Judas broke up his quarters, and marched at once to meet the new danger. It is characteristic of him to take the initiative.

40, 41. Then Timotheus said, &c.] Timotheus regarded it as a dangerous thing to fight a battle with such an obstacle as the watercourse immediately in one's rear. He was therefore disinclined to pass over it himself, and determined to leave it to Judas to cross or not, as he pleased. He felt, however, that, if Judas crossed, the act was one of such boldness as to foreshadow victory; while, if he shrank from so doing, his timidity would give courage to the other side, who

B. C. cir. 163.

42 Now when Judas came near the brook, he caused the scribes of the people to remain by the brook: unto whom he gave commandment, saying, Suffer no man to remain in the camp, but let all come to the battle.

43 So he went first over unto them, and all the people after him: then all the heathen, being discomfited before him, cast away their weapons, and fled unto the temple that was at Carnaim.

‖ Judas and his company.

44 But ‖they took the city, and burned the temple with all that were therein. Thus was Carnaim subdued, neither could they stand any longer before Judas.

B. C. cir. 163.

45 Then Judas gathered together all the Israelites that were in the country of Galaad, from the least unto the greatest, even their wives, and their children, and their stuff, a very great host, to the end they might come into the land of Judea.

46 Now when they came unto Ephron, (this was a great city in the way as they should go, very well might then proceed to the attack with confidence, as against an enemy who distrusted his own strength, and would probably offer no very stout resistance. No doubt he hoped that Judas would adopt the more timid course.

42. the scribes of the people.] Ewald regards these "scribes" as identical with the "officers" of Deut. xx. 5–9, who (he says) "kept the lists of the troops, assigned the place of encampment, and looked after the order of the march" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 314, note). Grimm notes that there were persons exercising, apparently, the same office in the later times of the monarchy (see 2 Chron. xxvi. 11). The Maccabean leaders had fallen back upon the military system of ancient times.

Suffer no man to remain in the camp.] Rather, "Suffer no man to encamp;" i.e. do not allow any tents to be pitched on the near side of the stream, make the whole host pass over. Judas had need of his entire force against the vast numbers of the enemy (see v. 38).

43. the heathen . . . cast away their weapons.] Rather, "their arms." The shield, as the greatest encumbrance, was usually cast away first of all (comp. Hor. 'Od.' ii. 7, l. 10: "Relicta non bene parmula").

and fled unto the temple that was at Carnaim.] Rather, "the sacred precinct that was at Carnaim." Temples were surrounded with walled inclosures, which were sometimes of sufficient size to allow of a large force encamping in them. The flight may have been directed to this place on some idea that it was sacred, and so inviolable, for the right of asylum was widely recognised in ancient times. But if so, the heathen had failed to apprehend the peculiar religious sentiments of the Jews, who saw nothing sacred in places of worship where idols were honoured and false gods received the adoration of their votaries. (See below, ch. x. 83, and cf. Ex. xxiii. 24, xxxiv. 13; Judg. vi. 25–27; 2 Kings x. 25–27, &c.)

44. they . . . burned the temple.] The temple was known as the "Atargateum," or temple of Atargatis (2 Macc. xii. 26), who was the Syrian Venus, worshipped with rites of unmentionable lewdness by the soft and sensuous Aramæans. (See Döllinger, 'Jew and Gentile,' vol. i. pp. 428–431.) Judas cannot be blamed for the destruction of such a sink of iniquity.

with all that were therein.] The "laws of war" have always been held to justify the destruction of enemies by fire, cruel as such destruction may be. Joshua "burnt Jericho with fire and all that was therein" (Josh. vi. 24). An Egyptian king took Gezer, and "burnt it with fire and slew the Canaanites that dwelt in the city" (1 Kings ix. 16). Cleomenes of Sparta acted almost exactly as Judas, when, having defeated the Argives, he shut up the remnant of their army in the sacred grove of Argus, and "ordered the helots to bring brushwood and heap it around the grove; which was done accordingly; and Cleomenes set the grove on fire" (Herod. vi. 80). Even in modern times red-hot shot are fired into besieged towns and forts, and foes who take refuge in caves are destroyed by blocking their mouths with brushwood and setting it alight. Humanity protests; but international law is silent.

neither could they stand any longer.] This last massacre brought the armed resistance to a close. Judas, however, did not venture to leave his fellow-countrymen in the district which he had overrun, and, in a certain sense, subjugated. Had he done so, his withdrawal would, he knew, have been the signal for terrible reprisals. Hence the "exodus" recorded in v. 45.

46. they came unto Ephron.] Ephron is well identified by Ewald ('Hist. of Israel,' vol.

B. C. cir. 163. fortified) they could not turn from it, either on the right hand or the left, but must needs pass through the midst of it.

47 Then they of the city shut them out, and stopped up the gates with stones.

48 Whereupon Judas sent unto them in peaceable manner, saying, Let us pass through your land to go into our own country, and none shall do you any hurt; we will only pass through on foot: howbeit they would not open unto him.

49 Wherefore Judas commanded a proclamation to be made throughout the host, that every man should pitch his tent in the place where he was.

50 So the soldiers pitched, and assaulted the city all that day and all that night, till at the length the city was delivered into his hands: B. C. cir. 163.

51 Who then slew all the males with the edge of the sword, and rased the city, and took the spoils thereof, and passed through the city over them that were slain.

52 After this went they over Jordan into the great plain before Bethsan.

53 And Judas gathered together those that ‖ came behind, and ‖ exhorted the people all the way through, till they came into the land of Judea.

54 So they went up to mount Sion with joy and gladness, where they offered ‖ burnt offerings, because not one of them were slain until they had returned in peace.

‖ Or, went hindmost, Num. 10. 25.

‖ Or, comforted, or, encouraged.

‖ Or, peace offerings, Joseph. Antiq. 12. 12.

v., p. 315, note) with the Gephrun, which was taken by Antiochus the Great in his war with Ptolemy Philopator (Polyb. v. 70), the ain of Ephron being represented (as so often) by the Greek γ. The site has not yet been fixed, but it must lie on the direct route between Ashtaroth-Karnaim and Beth-shan, at no great distance E. of the Jordan.

48. Judas sent unto them in peaceable manner.] Literally, "with peaceable words." The city was strong, and had not as yet been actively hostile. Judas was therefore willing to abstain from active measures against it. His proposals resemble those which Moses made to the Edomites (Num. xx. 14–17), the Amorites (ib. xxi. 22), and others on approaching the borders of the Holy Land.

we will only pass through on foot.] Cf. Num. xx. 19; Deut. ii. 28. The meaning is: "We will take nothing, damage nothing, but simply pass through the territory."

50. the city was delivered into his hands.] Not "surrendered," or "betrayed," but by God's providence given into his power.

51. rased the city.] This may account for there being no later mention of it by historians or geographers.

52. went they over Jordan into the great plain before Beth-san.] The Jordan can be forded in three places nearly opposite Beth-san (now Beisan). Its width is about fifty yards (Robinson, 'Later Researches,' p. 325). The "great plain before Beth-san" is probably not the valley-plain in which Beth-shan stands, which is only "from two to three miles broad between the mountains of Gilboa and the northern hills" (ib. p. 326), but rather the Ghôr itself, or Jordan valley, into which the Beth-shan valley opens. This is a "broad and fertile plain" traversed by numerous streams, and extending not less than twelve miles between the Jalud and the Wady Malik, with a width of seven or eight miles. (Robinson, p. 334.)

53. Judas gathered together those that came behind.] Rather, "those that lagged behind." Judas employed himself in keeping the host together, and hastening the laggards all down the Jordan valley, till he turned westward, probably by the Jericho route, into Judæa Proper. The whole of the Jordan valley seems to have been hostile territory.

54. they went up to mount Sion with joy and gladness.] A thanksgiving service after such signal victories was most appropriate. If really not a single Israelite was slain in a campaign wherein above six cities were stormed, and two great battles fought, with a loss to the enemy in one of them of "about eight thousand men" (v. 34), there was indeed occasion for the expression of national gratitude. It can scarcely, however, be supposed that such absolute impunity was enjoyed. The writer, no doubt, reports the tradition which he had heard; but it must be remembered that he probably wrote his history after the death of John Hyrcanus (ch. xvi. 24), which was in B.C. 106, or nearly sixty years from the date of this campaign of Judas. In sixty years' time "with small loss" easily becomes "without the loss of a man."

B. C. cir. 163.

55 Now what time as Judas and Jonathan were in the land of Galaad, and Simon his brother in Galilee before Ptolemais, 56 Joseph the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, captains of the garrisons, heard of the valiant acts and warlike deeds which they had done.

57 Wherefore they said, Let us also get us a name, and go fight against the heathen that are round about us.

58 So when they had given charge unto the garrison that was with them, they went toward Jamnia.

59 Then came Gorgias and his men out of the city ‖ to fight against them.

‖ Gr. to meet them in battle.

60 And so it was, that Joseph and Azarias were put to flight, and pursued unto the borders of Judea: and there were slain that day of the people of Israel about two thousand men.

B. C. cir. 163.

61 Thus was there a great overthrow among the children of Israel, because they were not obedient unto Judas and his brethren, but thought to do some valiant act.

62 Moreover these men came not of the seed of those, by whose hand deliverance was given unto Israel.

63 Howbeit the man Judas and his brethren were greatly renowned in the sight of all Israel, and of all the heathen, wheresoever their name was heard of;

64 Insomuch as the people assembled unto them with joyful acclamations.

65 Afterward went Judas forth with his brethren, and fought against the children of Esau in the land toward the south, where he smote

§ 4. MILITARY OPERATIONS OF THE LEADERS LEFT BY JUDAS TO DEFEND JUDÆA, AND THEIR FAILURE.

55–64. A desire to emulate the successes of Judas in Gilead, and Simon in Galilee, led Joseph and Azarias, the two "captains" who had been left in Judæa with special orders that they were to act only on the defensive (v. 19), to disregard their instructions, and make an expedition westward, against Jamnia, which was held by the Syrians. They were met by Gorgias, the opponent of Judas in the campaign of B.C. 165, outside the town, and defeated with a loss of 2000 men. The circumstance leads the author to contrast the glories of the leaders raised up by God with the futile efforts of those who did not belong to the chosen family.

55. Now what time.] The narrative goes back somewhat. In the absence of Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, at the time when Simon was before Ptolemaïs (v. 22), events of importance had occurred in Judæa.

56. captains of the garrisons.] Literally, "of the host." In v. 18, Joseph and Azarias are called "captains of the people," or rather "leaders of the people." (See note ad loc.)

58. toward Jamnia.] On the position of Jamnia, and its identity with the modern Jabneh, see note on ch. iv. 15.

59. Then came Gorgias.] See above, ch. iii. 38, iv. 1–22; and compare 2 Macc. viii. 9, where Gorgias is called "a captain who in matters of war had great experience." He was evidently a general not to be trifled with.

62. these men came not of the seed of those, by whose hand deliverance was given.] The author evidently regards the Maccabee family as chosen by God to work His people's deliverance, though no external call had designated them for their post. He thinks it was a presumption on the part of Joseph and Azarias to undertake of themselves to help in freeing the Jews, since they were not of the right blood. Moderns will scarcely sympathise with this view, though they may be ready to blame the unsuccessful captains for their disobedience to the orders given them.

63. the man Judas and his brethren were greatly renowned.] The ill-success of Joseph and Azarias added to the renown of the Maccabee brothers, since it shewed that the enemy, against whom they were engaged, was far from contemptible, and also that the Jews were formidable foes only under their leadership. The expression—"the man Judas"—seems an imitation of that in Ex. xi. 3: "moreover the man Moses was very great." (Compare Num. xii. 3.)

§ 5. EXPEDITION OF JUDAS INTO IDUMÆA AND PHILISTIA.

65–68. It was not till nearly Pentecost in the year B.C. 163 that Judas returned to Jerusalem from his Gilead expedition (2 Macc. xii. 31, 32). After a very short delay, he again took the field, and made a raid into Idumæa.

B. C. cir. 163. Hebron, and the ‖towns thereof, and pulled down the fortress of it, and burned the towers thereof round about.

‖ Gr. daughters.

66 From thence he removed to go into the land of ‖the Philistines, and passed through Samaria.

‖ Gr. strangers.

67 At that time certain priests, desirous to shew their valour, were slain in battle, for that they went out to fight unadvisedly.

68 So Judas turned to Azotus in the land of the Philistines, and when he had pulled down their altars, and burned their carved images with fire, and spoiled their cities, he returned into the land of Judea. B. C. cir. 163.

CHAPTER VI.

8 Antiochus dieth, 12 and confesseth that he is plagued for the wrong done to Jerusalem. 20 Judas besiegeth those in the tower at Jerusalem. 28 They procure Antiochus the younger to come into Judea. 51 He besiegeth Sion, 60 and maketh peace with Israel; 62 yet overthroweth the wall of Sion.

where he destroyed Hebron (v. 65). Thence he marched, through Mareshah into Philistia, where he captured the strong city of Ashdod, destroyed its idol shrines, and ravaged its territory. Having so done, he returned into Judæa.

65. Hebron.] This well-known city was situated in the hill-country originally assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 54), at the distance of about twenty miles from Jerusalem towards the south. Its original name was Kirjath-Arba. After having been the capital of David for seven years (2 Sam. v. 5), it sank into a position of very secondary importance, and is seldom mentioned in the history of the kings. Rehoboam fortified it against Shishak (2 Chr. xi. 10). It was re-occupied by the returned Judæans after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 25). We hear of it in the last war with Rome as captured by an officer of Vespasian (Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' iv. 9, § 9). The Crusaders captured it in the twelfth century, and made it the seat of a bishopric. Soon afterwards it was recovered by the Mohammedans, and has remained in their hands. The mosque is supposed to contain the tombs of Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah, and also of Joseph; and is reckoned a place of great sanctity. The modern Arab name is El Khalil—"the friend"—a term by which Abraham is intended, who was "the friend of God" (2 Chr. xx. 7; Is. xli. 8; James ii. 23).

66. and passed through Samaria.] "Samaria" is palpably a wrong reading. The direct route between Hebron and Ashdod or Azotus, would not pass within seventy miles of Samaria, which is further removed from both Hebron and Ashdod than they are from each other. Josephus substitutes Marissa—i.e. Mareshah—for Samaria; and no doubt this is the true reading. Mareshah lay on the natural line of march from Hebron to Ashdod. It was situated on a gently swelling hill that sinks down into the great Philistine plain, and commanded one of the best approaches to the high country. Fortified by Rehoboam against Shishak (2 Chr. xi. 8), it was soon afterwards threatened by Zerah (ib. xiv. 9), but witnessed his defeat by Asa and the complete destruction of his army. After this we hear nothing of Mareshah until the present occasion, when it appears to have been the scene of a struggle in which Judas was not so successful as usual. (See v. 67, and compare 2 Macc. xii. 34, 35.) We hear of Mareshah again in the later wars. It was taken and destroyed by John Hyrcanus about B.C. 120, restored by Pompey about B.C. 62, and once more taken and plundered by the Parthians in B.C. 39. The site is marked by the modern village of Marash on the route between Hebron and Beit-Jibrin.

67. they went out to fight unadvisedly.] The writer of the Second Book says, that those who were slain were semi-idolaters, upon whose bodies were found things that had been consecrated to idols (2 Macc. xii. 40).

68. Azotus.] See note on ch. iv. 15.

their carved images.] That the Philistines had images of their gods appears from 1 Sam. v. 3, 4, where the destruction of the image of Dagon, at this very town of Ashdod, is recorded. Derceto or Atargatis seems to have been worshipped by the Philistines of Ascalon. Their other deities, if they had any, are unknown to us. A more complete destruction of Azotus, with its idol temple, was effected at a later date by Jonathan (ch. x. 84).

CHAPTER VI.

§ 1. Death of Antiochus Epiphanes, and Accession of his Son, Antiochus Eupator.

1–17. That Antiochus Epiphanes died in the distant East, after an abortive attempt to plunder a temple of Nanæa or Anaitis, the Persian Venus (or Diana), must be regarded as historically certain, on the concurrent and uncontradicted testimony of Polybius (xxxi. 2). Appian ('Syriac.' 66), Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 1), and our author. That his death

B. C. cir. 163. ABOUT that time king Antiochus travelling through the high countries heard say, that Elymais in the country of Persia was a city greatly renowned for riches, silver, and gold;

2 And that there was in it a very rich temple, wherein were ‖coverings of gold, and breastplates, and ‖shields, which Alexander, son of Philip, the Macedonian king, who reigned first among the Grecians, had left there. B. C. cir. 16

3 Wherefore he came and sought to take the city, and to spoil it; but he was not able, because they of the city, having had warning thereof,

4 Rose up against him in battle: so he fled, and departed thence with great heaviness, and returned to Babylon.

‖ Or, shields.
‖ Or, armour.

was the consequence of mental suffering, and not of violence, or bodily disease, though not allowed on all hands, may be considered as in a high degree probable. It was natural that various stories should be told about an event so strange, so unexpected, and so removed from the general cognizance; and so we find a violent death in the temple which he was plundering reported in one place (2 Macc. i. 13–16), and a death by a lingering and dreadful disease recorded in another (ib. ix. 5–28). Polybius, however, and our author agree, that the monarch's sufferings were mental; and further, that they arose, at any rate in part, from religious qualms connected with his desecration of temples. No confidence can be placed in the historical truth of the deathbed speech ascribed to him in verses 10–13; though it is quite possible that Philip, or some other person who was with him when he died, may have reported a change in his sentiments respecting the Jews. Little, however, in the present narrative can be accepted as certainly true beyond the attack on the temple (vv. 1–3), its failure (v. 4), the king's intense grief (vv. 8, 15), his appointment of Philip as guardian of his son's rights (vv. 14, 15), and his decease soon after (v. 16).

1. the high countries.] See note on ch. iii. 37, where the same expression occurs.

Elymaïs in the country of Persia was a city.] This seems to be a mistake. No mention is made of such a city by any writer, except our author, and Josephus, who simply follows him ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 1). Elymaïs was a country, properly a portion of Susiana, lying towards the north in the Zagros mountain-region (Strab. xi. pp. 759–62; xvi. p. 1056); but as Susiana itself was reckoned a part of Persia (ib. xv. 3, § 2), Elymaïs would be "in the country of Persia" (compare 2 Macc. i. 13). The city attacked by Antiochus is called (in 2 Macc. ix. 2) "Persepolis;" but this important place was never reckoned to Elymaïs.

greatly renowned for riches.] Polybius agrees in viewing the attack of Antiochus on the temple in question as arising entirely from cupidity (xxxi. 2). He does not mention the name of the city, but agrees that it was in Elymaïs. So also Appian ('Syriac.' § 66).

2. a very rich temple.] Polybius calls it "a temple of Artemis"—Appian, "a temple of Aphrodite,"—the author of the Second Book "a temple of Nanæa" (ii. 13). According to some accounts, Antiochus put forward as a pretext for his designs upon the temple-treasures, that he wished to espouse the goddess, and would take the gold and silver as her dowry (2 Macc. i. 14; Granius Licin. quoted by Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 316, note 2). On the true character of Nanæa, see note on 2 Macc. i. 13.

coverings of gold, and breastplates, and shields.] Rather, "coverings of gold, both breastplates and shields." The "coverings" are the chief species of defensive arms. (See ch. iv. 6.)

Alexander, son of Philip.] Cf. ch. i. 1–7. There had been so many Alexanders—Alexander, son of Alexander the Great; Alexander, son of Polysperchon; Alexander Balas, &c. —when the author wrote, that some distinctive title or description was necessary.

had left there.] Not "had left untouched," but "had himself left as presents." Alexander's habit was to acknowledge the gods of all the countries which he conquered, and to make offerings to their temples. It was customary to offer arms in temples as thank-offerings on account of victories (Herod. ii. 159; iii. 47, &c.).

3, 4. they of the city... rose up against him.] So Polybius, l. s. c. It is curious that Antiochus should have made this attempt, when his father had failed in a similar one on a temple of Belus in this same region, and had actually lost his life. (See Strab. xvi. 1, § 18; Justin. xxxii. 2.) His cupidity seems to have blinded him.

returned to Babylon.] Polybius says that he "retired to Tabæ in Persia;" but that place may have been on the way to Babylon. Our author does not really say that he "returned to Babylon," but that he quitted Elymaïs with the intention of returning thither (ἀπῆρεν ἐκεῖθεν . . . ἀποστρέψαι εἰς

B. C. cir. 163.

5 Moreover there came one who brought him tidings into Persia, that the armies, which went against the land of Judea, were put to flight:

6 And that Lysias, who went forth first with a great power, was driven away of the Jews; and that they were made strong by the armour, and power, and store of spoils, which they had gotten of the armies, whom they had destroyed:

7 Also that they had pulled down [a] the abomination, which he had set up upon the altar in Jerusalem, and that they had compassed about the sanctuary with high walls, as before, and his city Bethsura.

[a] ch. 1. 54.

8 Now when the king heard these words, he was astonished and sore moved: whereupon he laid him down upon his bed, and fell sick for grief, because it had not befallen him as he looked for.

B. C. cir. 163.

9 And there he continued many days: for his grief was ever more and more, and he made account that he should die.

10 Wherefore he called for all his friends, and said unto them, The sleep is gone from mine eyes, and my heart faileth for very care.

11 And I thought with myself, Into what tribulation am I come, and how great a flood of misery is it, wherein now I am! for I was bountiful and beloved in my power.

12 But now I remember the evils that I did at Jerusalem, and that [b] I took all the vessels of gold and silver that were therein, and [c] sent to destroy

[b] ch. 1. 21, &c.

[c] ch. 1. 57.

Βαβυλῶνα). He places his death in Persia (vv. 5, 9, 56).

6. that Lysias...was driven away.] See ch. iv. 34, 35.

they were made strong by the armour . . . which they had gotten.] The great want of the patriots at first had been arms and armour (ch. iv. 6). Judas took the sword of Apollonius, and "therewith fought all his life long" (ch. iii. 12). His followers no doubt imitated him, and armed themselves with the weapons and armour of the Syrians whom they slew in battle.

7. they had pulled down the abomination.] See above, ch. iv. 43.

compassed about the sanctuary with high walls, as before.] See ch. iv. 60. It may be questioned whether the Temple area had ever previously been completely fortified. No doubt there had always been fortifications on the east, and the south-east, where the line of the Temple area coincided with the outer limits of the town. But until the occupation by Judas, it had not been necessary to fortify, as against an enemy, the northern or western parts, which abutted on the city itself.

and his city Bethsura.] Jerusalem might perhaps be justly claimed by them as their city, but Bethsura at least belonged to Antiochus; yet they had fortified that also! (See ch. iv. 41.)

8. he . . . fell sick for grief.] Polybius (l. s. c.) connects the death of Antiochus, not with any intelligence that reached him from Syria, but with the attack upon the temple of Nanæa and its failure. There had, he says, been certain supernatural appearances on the occasion of that misdeed; and Antiochus was smitten thereby with a superstitious dread, which led to his demise. Josephus catches at the alleged cause, and asks, with some force, "Is it not more likely that his remorse and despair were caused by the desecration of the Temple at Jerusalem, which he actually carried into effect, than by a contemplated sacrilege, in which he was foiled?" ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 1.)

9. there he continued.] By "there" is meant the place in Persia where he was when the bad news reached him (v. 5)—i. e. Tabæ, as we learn from Polybius. (See the comment on vv. 3, 4.)

10. he . . . said unto them.] The speech here given differs wholly from that sketched in 2 Macc. ix. 12–17, and is probably equally unhistorical. The writer follows the example of the principal historians who had preceded him, and gives, in the form of speeches, the feelings which he supposes his chief personages to have entertained.

11. I was bountiful and beloved in my power.] The liberality of Epiphanes has been already noticed (see the comment on ch. iii. 30). That he was generally popular with his heathen subjects, and especially with those of the capital, whom he delighted with shows and festivals (Polyb. xxxi. 3, § 1–10), is highly probable. Even his edict of intolerance (ch. i. 41, 42) seems to have provoked no hostility among any people excepting the Jews (ch. i. 42; ii. 18, 19).

12. I took all the vessels of gold and silver.] See ch. i. 21–23.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

the inhabitants of Judea without a cause.

13 I perceive therefore that for this cause these troubles are come upon me, and, behold, I perish through great grief in a strange land.

14 Then called he for Philip, one of his friends, whom he made ruler over all his realm, 15 And gave him the crown, and his robe, and his signet, to the end ‖ he should bring up his son Antiochus, and nourish him up for the kingdom.

‖ Or, he should take his son Antiochus to him.

16 So king Antiochus died there in the hundred forty and ninth year. B. C. cir. 163.

17 Now when Lysias knew that the king was dead, he set up Antiochus his son, whom he had brought up being young, to reign in his stead, and his name he called Eupator.

18 About this time they that were in the tower shut up the Israelites round about the sanctuary, and sought always their hurt, and the strengthening of the heathen.

19 Wherefore Judas purposing to

I . . . sent to destroy the inhabitants of Judæa.] See ch. iii. 35, 36.

14. Philip, one of his friends.] The author of the Second Book says (ch. ix. 29) that Philip was the σύντροφος of Epiphanes, i.e. his foster-brother. He is thought by some to be identical with the Philip who was made governor of Jerusalem immediately after the plunder of the Temple by Antiochus (2 Macc. v. 22), who was "a Phrygian, and for manners more barbarous" even than his master. It is a further conjecture that he was "the master of the elephants" at the battle of Magnesia (Liv. xxxvii. 41). But these guesses are of little value.

whom he made ruler.] I.e. "regent." His intention was, that Philip should have the custody of his son's person, the direction of his education, and the supreme authority during his minority. Probably he regarded Lysias as having forfeited the post by the proofs which he had given of military incapacity.

15. his signet.] The signet-ring was the special mark of royal authority. (See Gen. xli. 42; Esther iii. 10, viii. 2.) Alexander the Great gave his to Perdiccas, and thereby marked him out as next inheritor of his power (Arrian, 'Exp. Al.' vii. 26, § 5).

to the end he should bring up his son.] The Greek will not bear this translation. As the text stands (τοῦ ἀγαγεῖν Ἀντίοχον τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ), it can only mean "to the end that he should take Antiochus his son." Josephus, however, appears to have had in his copies Ἀντιόχῳ τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ—a reading which would give the sense, "to take them (i.e. the crown, signet, &c.) to Antiochus." (See Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 2.)

16. in the hundred forty and ninth year.] Towards the close of B.C. 164, or in the earlier part of B.C. 163.

17. Lysias . . . set up Antiochus his son.] So Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' l. s. c.) and Appian ('Syriac.' § 46).

being young.] Appian makes Antiochus Eupator no more than nine years old at his father's death ('Syriac.' § 45 and § 66). But Porphyry (ap. Euseb. 'Chron.' Can. i. 40, § 15) makes him twelve. This latter account agrees better than the other with the part said to have been taken by Eupator in the Jewish war (vv. 28–47).

his name he called Eupator.] Appian says that "the Syrians" gave him the name ('Syriac.' § 46) on account of the good qualities of his father.

§ 2. JUDAS BESIEGES THE SYRIAN GARRISON IN THE TOWER AT JERUSALEM—APPEAL MADE TO EUPATOR FOR ASSISTANCE.

18–27. The position of the two garrisons, Judæan and Syrian, in the Temple mount and the "tower," built by Epiphanes over against it (ch. i. 33–36), must have been intolerable to both parties. The tower was an ἐπιτείχισμὸς of the most annoying kind; and we cannot be surprised that the Maccabee leader, flushed with the victories that he had gained on all sides, should have determined on making a strenuous effort to capture it. It would seem that his attack promised to be successful, and that the defenders felt their only hope of safety to lie in the approach of an army of relief. Hence their appeal to Eupator.

18. they that were in the tower.] See ch. i. 33 and iv. 41.

shut up the Israelites round about the sanctuary.] The writer does not mean that the Israelites were formally besieged or blockaded, but that their movements were cramped, and that it was not safe for them to go beyond their walls. (Compare ch. i. 36 and 37; and Josephus, 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 3: τοὺς ἀναβαίνοντας εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν, θύσαι destroy them, called all the people together to besiege them.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163 — 162.

20 So they came together, and besieged them in the hundred and fiftieth year, and he made mounts for shot against them, and other engines.

21 Howbeit certain of them that were besieged got forth, unto whom some ungodly men of Israel joined themselves:

22 And they went unto the king, and said, How long will it be ere thou execute judgment, and avenge our brethren?

23 We have been willing to serve thy father, and to do as he would have us, and to obey his commandments;

24 For which cause they of our nation besiege the tower, and are alienated from us: moreover [d] as many of us as they could light on they slew, and spoiled our inheritance. B. C. cir. 162. [d] ch. 5. 22, 44, 51.

25 Neither have they stretched out their hand against us only, but also against all their borders.

26 And, behold, this day are they besieging the tower at Jerusalem, to take it: the sanctuary also and [e] Bethsura have they fortified. [e] ch. 4. 61.

27 Wherefore if thou dost not prevent them quickly, they will do greater things than these, neither shalt thou be able to rule them.

βουλομένους, ἐξαίφνης ἐκτρέχοντες οἱ φρουροὶ διέφθειραν.)

20. the hundred and fiftieth year.] The year commencing in the autumn of B.C. 163, and terminating in that of B.C. 162.

he made mounts for shot against them.] Rather, "towers for shooting at them." The βελοστάσεις of the text seem to have been moveable towers, such as were used both by the Assyrians and the Greeks, which were brought near to the walls, and enabled the assailants to attack the defenders on the same level. (See 'Ancient Monarchies,' vol. i. pp. 470–2.) The word is used by the LXX. in Ezek. xvii. 17, xxi. 22, where our translators have "forts," "a fort."

and other engines.] Rather, "and engines." The "towers" were not regarded as "engines," which term applied especially to catapults, ballistæ, and battering-rams. It is rightly observed (Stanley) that Judas here for the first time brought into use a battering-train.

21. ungodly men.] I.e. "men of the Hellenizing party." (See above, ch. i. 43, 52; ii. 18, &c.)

22. they went unto the king.] The writer does not seem to realize the fact of Eupator's immature age. He has called him νεώτερον (v. 17), but apparently is not aware that he was a mere child, twelve years old at the most.

23. We have been willing to serve thy father.] Rather, "we were of those who willed to serve," &c. i.e. we belonged to the conforming party, and obeyed the edicts of Antiochus Epiphanes (ch. i. 41–50), which a part of our nation refused to obey, and now we are brought into trouble on that very account (v. 24).

to do as he would have us.] Literally, "to walk according to his sayings."

24. as many of us as they could light on they slew.] See above, ch. ii. 44; iii. 8.

25. against all their borders.] Compare ch. v. 3–51.

26. the sanctuary also and Bethsura have they fortified.] On the fortification of the Temple by Judas, see ch. iv. 60; and on that of Bethzur (Bethsura), see ch. iv. 61.

§ 3. THE WAR OF LYSIAS AND EUPATOR AGAINST JUDAS—FALL OF BETHSURA—SIEGE OF THE TEMPLE.

28–54. The boldness of Judas, the danger of the Syrian garrison in the Tower (Acra) at Jerusalem, and the very cogent arguments of the renegade Jews at Antioch (vv. 22–27), roused the Syrians to a great effort. The author of the Second Book tells us, that there was at first some difference of opinion at the Court, a certain Ptolemy Macron advising that good terms of peace should be offered to the party of Judas (2 Macc. x. 12); but sterner counsels prevailed—Lysias was all-powerful—and the resolution was taken to crush the patriots by sending against them an overwhelming force. It is not clear that as yet Lysias apprehended danger either from Philip, the regent appointed by Epiphanes on his deathbed (v. 15), or from Demetrius, who was still in custody at Rome (ch. vii. 1). If he did, there would, however, be the more reason for haste, in order to get rid of one enemy before the necessity arose for dealing with others. The immense army described in vv. 30–41 was therefore collected and marched upon Bethzur. Judas was for the first time defeated (vv. 42–47). Bethzur capitulated (vv. 49, 50); and siege was laid to the Temple (vv. 51–54).

Digitized by Microsoft

B. C. cir. 162.

28 Now when the king heard this, he was angry, and gathered together all his friends, and the captains of his army, and those that had charge of the horse.

29 There came also unto him from other kingdoms, and from isles of the sea, bands of hired soldiers.

30 So that the number of his army was an hundred thousand footmen, and twenty thousand horsemen, and two and thirty elephants exercised in battle.

31 These went through Idumea, and pitched against Bethsura, which they assaulted many days, making engines of war; but they of Bethsura came out, and burned them with fire, and fought valiantly.

B. C. cir. 162.

32 Upon this Judas removed from the tower, and pitched in Bathzacharias, over against the king's camp.

33 Then the king rising very early marched fiercely with his host toward Bathzacharias, where his ar-

28. when the king heard this, he was angry.] The representations were probably made, not to the boy king, but to Lysias, who may well have been "angry," or at any rate greatly vexed, at what he heard. It must certainly have been Lysias who gave the orders for the collection of the forces of the kingdom.

those that had charge of the horse.] Literally, "those that were over the reins"—an expression which seems to point to a chariot force. According to the author of the Second Book (2 Macc. xiii. 2), Lysias brought with him on this occasion 5300 horsemen, and "three hundred chariots armed with hooks."

29. from other kingdoms.] As Pergamus and Bithynia, perhaps also Paphlagonia and Pontus.

from isles of the sea.] Crete, Rhodes, and Cyprus were always willing to furnish mercenary troops in the wars of this period. They usually served as slingers and archers. (See Appian, 'Syriac.' § 32; 'Bell. Civ.' ii. § 70, &c.)

30. the number of his army.] The numbers here given are confirmed by one passage of Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 3), but contradicted by another, where they are said to have been 50,000 foot, 5000 horse, and 80 elephants ('Bell. Jud.' i. 1, § 5). The author of the Second Book (2 Macc. l. s. c.) makes the horse 5300, which may be accepted as probably the true number. He makes the foot 110,000, which is not improbable; the elephants twenty-two, which may also be correct. By the treaty of Magnesia the Syrian king was bound to keep no war-elephants. Polybius tells us that Eupator had broken the engagement ('Hist.' xi. 12, § 11); but it is scarcely likely that he had collected a very large corps. We may safely reject the "eighty elephants" of Josephus ('Bell. Jud.' l. s. c.).

31. These went through Idumea.] The Syrians considered that the best mode of attacking Judæa was to proceed along the coast of the Mediterranean from Carmel southwards, and then make the assault upon the west, or upon the south. They had attacked twice from the west, first under Seron (ch. iii. 14–16), and again under Nicanor and Gorgias (ch. iii. 38–41; ch. iv. 1–23). Later, under Lysias himself, they had attacked from the south (ch. iv. 28–34). Lysias now repeated this movement.

they of Bethsura.] These words are wanting in the original, but are rightly supplied by our translators.

and burned them with fire.] This was a usual practice of besiegers. As the military engines of the time were chiefly composed of wood, they readily took fire. We find the Assyrians protecting their engines against fire by means of curtains of cloth, leather, or other non-inflammable material ('Ancient Monarchies,' vol. i. p. 471); and a similar practice seems to have been known to the Greeks (Thucyd. ii. 75). Sometimes, however, the flames were simply met and kept in check by means of a supply of water.

32. Judas removed from the tower.] The first result of the attack on Bethsura was to raise the siege of "the tower." Judas felt that his presence was required to meet and check the enemy in the south, and accordingly gave up the siege, struck his camp, and marched to Beth-Zacharias, which Josephus says ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 4) was 70 stades, or eight miles, from Bethsura. It commanded a narrow pass, and has been almost certainly identified with the modern Beit-Sakariyeh, which lies nearly due north of Beit-sur, at a distance by the road of about nine Roman miles (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. iii. p. 284).

over against the king's camp.] This expression is hard to reconcile with the distance assigned by Josephus. (See the last note.) It implies that the two camps were, at any rate, within sight of each other.

33. the king . . . marched fiercely.] In the

B. C. cir. 162.

mies made them ready to battle, and sounded the trumpets.

34 And to the end they might provoke the elephants to fight, they shewed them the blood of grapes and mulberries.

35 Moreover they divided the beasts among the armies, and for every elephant they appointed a thousand men, armed with coats of mail, and with helmets of brass on their heads; and beside this, for every beast were ordained five hundred horsemen of the best.

36 These were ready at every occasion: wheresoever the beast was, and whithersoever the beast went, they went also, neither departed they from him. B. C. cir. 162

37 And upon the beasts were there strong towers of wood, which covered every one of them, and were girt fast unto them with devices: there were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled him.

38 As for the remnant of the original, the "fierceness," or "eagerness to attack the foe," is ascribed, not to the king, but to the host. Translate—"Then the king, rising very early, marched his host, which was eager for the fight, toward Beth-Zacharias."

sounded the trumpets.] Rather, "sounded with trumpets." On the use of trumpets in war by the Greeks and Romans, see note on ch. v. 31.

34. to the end they might provoke the elephants, &c.] It has been supposed that the elephants were "provoked" by the sight of red wine and of a spirituous liquor obtained from mulberries, both being beverages of which they were fond (Grimm); but wine is not called "the blood of grapes" except in highly wrought poetry (Gen. xlix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 14; Ecclus. l. 15); nor is a spirituous liquor obtained from mulberries a thing known to antiquity. Probably the two liquids were the expressed juice of the two fruits, unfermented, and were intended to represent blood to the animals, and so to remind them of battle and prepare them for it.

35. they divided the beasts among the armies.] Rather, "among the legions" or "companies." It was more usual to draw up the elephants in a separate body, generally in front of the other troops, and to make them advance first upon the enemy. Antiochus the Great had, however, at Magnesia interposed his elephants in pairs between the divisions of his phalanx (Liv. xxxviii. 40; App. 'Syriac.' § 32), and thus set the example of separating them. A new disposition was now tried.

armed with coats of mail.] Rather, "wearing corslets of chain armour." Chain armour was known to the Assyrians, but appears to have been used by them only as an appendage to the helmet ('Ancient Monarchies,' vol. i. p. 441, plates). Corslets were in the early times generally of leather, protected by metal scales. In Roman times, however, the corslets here mentioned became common. (See Polyb. vi. 21; Arrian, 'Tact.' pp. 13, 14, &c.)

36. These were ready at every occasion, &c.] Rather, "these were with the beast, wherever he was, even before the fight began." (Πρὸ καιροῦ cannot possibly mean "on every occasion.") The object was to accustom the elephants to the men and horses of their own side, and to accustom the horses to them. In default of such mutual acquaintance, elephants were apt to inflict more damage on the army to which they belonged than on the enemy.

37. upon the beasts were there strong towers of wood.] In the Indian war of Alexander the Great, where elephants first make their appearance in Greek warfare, we do not hear of "towers" being placed on them. Apparently, the practice commenced with the Syrians, whose "beasts" were thus armed at Magnesia in B.C. 190, nearly thirty years before the present engagement. (See Liv. xxxvii. 40.) The "towers" cannot really have been of any great size, or have contained more than three or four soldiers.

with devices.] "Girths" seem to be intended. So heavy a fabric as a "tower" could not otherwise have been kept in place.

two and thirty strong men.] This is quite impossible. Livy (l. s. c.) makes the number of soldiers to each elephant in the army of Antiochus the Great four; Ælian gives, as the ordinary Indian equipment, three; some moderns say that in recent times towers on elephants have held a garrison of five. Probably, either no number was given here in the original text; or else the text ran, ἐφ' ἑκάστου αὐτῶν ἄνδρες δυνάμεως δύο ἢ τρεῖς—"on each of them strong men to the number of two or three."

beside the Indian that ruled him.] Lite-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 162.

horsemen, they set them on this side and that side at the two parts of the host, ‖giving them signs what to do, and being harnessed all over amidst the ranks.

‖ Or, stirring them and being commanded with the ranks, or, intended with the valleys.

39 Now when the sun shone upon the shields of gold and brass, the mountains glistered therewith, and shined like lamps of fire.

40 So part of the king's army being spread upon the high mountains, and part on the valleys below, they marched on safely and in order.

B. C. cir. 162.

41 Wherefore all that heard the noise of their multitude, and the marching of the company, and the rattling of the harness, were moved: for the army was very great and mighty.

42 Then Judas and his host drew near, and entered into battle, and rally, "beside his Indian." It is assumed that, as a matter of course, each elephant would have an Indian driver. The elephants employed by the Seleucidæ were originally derived from India, and, though bred in part at Apamea, no doubt required to be kept up by frequent importations from the region where they were indigenous. Expert Hindoo drivers would accompany each such importation.

38. the remnant of the horsemen.] Those that remained over, after the thirty-two troops attached to the elephants had been deducted. They would have amounted, according to the numbers previously given, to four thousand.

they set them on this side and that side.] Compare the arrangement at Magnesia (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 32: ἱππεῖς δ' ἑκατέρωθεν παρατετάχατο).

giving them signs what to do.] The meaning of the text is very uncertain. Κατασείω is properly "to shake down," and is used primarily of shaking down fruit from trees. It also means "to shake up and down," as "the hand," or "a stick;" and hence signifies sometimes "to make a sign with the hand," as in Acts xii. 17, xiii. 16, xix. 33, and xxi. 40, where, however, τῇ χειρὶ is always added. It has further the meanings "to disturb," "to throw down," "to make a man unsteady through drink," and "to affright." None of these significations seems particularly appropriate here; and hence the reading is with reason suspected.

being harnessed all over amidst the ranks.] This clause is even more difficult than the preceding. There are two readings, ἐν ταῖς φάλαγξιν and ἐν ταῖς φάραγξιν, of which the latter, being the most difficult, should, according to the ordinary laws of criticism, be preferred. "Being harnessed all over" is a possible meaning of καταφρασσόμενοι, but grammatically the word does not refer to the horsemen, but to the generals who set them their places, whose wearing of complete armour would scarcely be mentioned. Schleusner explains καταφρασσόμενοι here as "guarding" or "covering their flanks with them." Ἐν ταῖς φάραγξιν would mean "among the precipices," where extra precaution would no doubt be necessary.

39. the shields of gold and brass.] It is not probable that "shields of gold" were ever employed in warfare. They were used as the ornaments of temples (1 Kings x. 16) or sent as presents to the authorities of foreign states (1 Macc. xiv. 24; xv. 18, &c.). Silver shields were, however, actually borne by troops in the field, notably by those of Alexander the Great (Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.' vii. 11) and his successors (Polyb. v. 79, § 4; Liv. xxxvii. 40; App. 'Syriac.' § 32, &c.). These may have been mistaken by the Jews for golden shields, when the sun shone upon them, or the writer may only mean that the shields were partly of brass and partly of gold, which is quite possible.

40. the high mountains . . . the valleys.] Rather, "the high hills—the low ground." The hills of southern Judæa do not attain the dignity of "mountains," nor are the wadys which separate them exactly "valleys." The army of Antiochus advancing from the south upon Beth-Zacharias probably proceeded up the Wady Shukheit, which is "straight and shallow" (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. iii. p. 283), its flanks crowning the hills on either side, which are quite practicable, even for cavalry. The country presents no remarkable difficulties, though Beth-Zacharias is strongly posted.

41. the army was very great and mighty.] It was the utmost force that Syria could raise under the circumstances, larger (according to one account, Liv. xxxvii. 40) than that which had met the Romans at Magnesia, and very much the largest army with which Judas had as yet contended.

42. Judas and his host drew near.] Judas followed his usual tactics. He did not shut himself up within Beth-Zacharias, or even stand on the defensive, but advanced to meet the foe. (See ch. iii. 11, 16, 23; iv. 12, 29; v. 43, &c.)

B. C. cir. 162.

there were slain of the king's army six hundred men.

43 ¶ f Eleazar also, surnamed Savaran, perceiving that one of the beasts, armed with royal harness, was higher than all the rest, and supposing that the king was upon him,

f ch. 2. 5.

44 Put himself in jeopardy, to the end he might deliver his people, and get him a perpetual name:

45 Wherefore he ran upon him courageously through the midst of the battle, slaying on the right hand and on the left, ‖ so that they were divided from him on both sides.

‖ Or, so that he cut them in pieces.

46 Which done, he crept under the elephant, and thrust him under, and slew him: whereupon the elephant fell down upon him, and there he died.

B. C. cir. 1

47 Howbeit the rest of the Jews seeing the strength of the king, and the violence of his forces, turned away from them.

48 ¶ Then the king's army went up to Jerusalem to meet them, and the king pitched his tents ‖ against Judea, and against mount Sion.

‖ Or, i Judea

49 But with them that were in Bethsura he made peace: ‖ for they came out of the city, because they had no victuals there to endure the siege, it being a year of rest to the land.

‖ Add of Jose phus, they yielded themselves.

50 So the king took Bethsura, and set a garrison there to keep it.

51 As for the sanctuary, he be-there were slain of the king's army six hundred men.] The first assault was, apparently, successful. But numbers prevailed in the end, and Judas felt himself compelled to beat a retreat (v. 47).

43. Eleazar, surnamed Savaran.] Compare ch. ii. 5, where he is said to have been called "Avaran." Dean Stanley conjectures that the name was given on account of the deed here recorded, and translates, "the Beast-Sticker" ('Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 318).

armed with royal harness.] Heavy armour was worn, both by elephants and horses, in the wars of this period. By "royal harness" we must understand armour of unusual richness and magnificence, such as seemed to indicate a royal rider. Grimm supposes that the beast was really "the royal elephant," though it did not at this time carry the king, who was too young to take actual part in the battle.

supposing that the king was upon him.] Literally, "he looked as if the king was upon him." The phrase used implies that the fact was otherwise.

44. and get him a perpetual name.] On the prevalence of this motive among the best Jews of the time, see note on ch. ii. 51.

45. through the midst of the battle.] Literally, "into the midst of the phalanx." Eleazar cut his way through the enemy's ranks until he reached the elephant which he was bent on attacking.

46. and thrust him under.] Rather, "and got beneath him." We must supply ἑαυτὸν after ὑπέθηκεν. It is impossible to supply ξίφος.

47. The author is loth to acknowledge the complete defeat of the Jews, and seeks to throw a veil over it; but nevertheless he makes it sufficiently apparent by the facts of his narrative. The Jews, he admits, "turned away" from their foes—i.e. retired before them—retreated (as Josephus tells us, 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 5) to Jerusalem. The Syrians felt strong enough to divide their forces. While a part besieged Beth-zur (v. 49), the bulk marched on Jerusalem, and commenced the siege of the Temple fortress (vv. 48, 51).

49. with them that were in Bethsura he made peace.] Again a softening of the facts. We see from what follows that Bethsura was besieged, reduced to extremity, and "taken" (v. 50). The garrison may have been allowed terms, but what they were is not stated. Josephus (l. s. c.) says that they surrendered themselves on the condition that their persons should be safe.

it being a year of rest to the land.] I.e. it was a sabbatical year, and the granaries were exhausted. (Compare v. 53.) It may seem strange that greater precautions had not been taken; but Judas's long career of success had probably blinded him to the danger which might impend in case of a reverse. Evidently, neither Beth-zur nor Jerusalem had been properly provisioned against the chance of a siege.

51. As for the sanctuary, he besieged it many days.] The Temple had now become a fortress. Judas had fortified it "with high walls and strong towers round about" (ch. iv.

sieged it many days: and ‖set there artillery with engines and instruments to cast fire and stones, and pieces to cast darts and slings.

52 Whereupon ‖they also made engines against their engines, and held them battle a long season.

53 Yet at the last, their vessels being without victuals, (for that it was the seventh year, and they in Judea, that were delivered from the Gentiles, had eaten up the residue of the store;)

54 There were but a few left in the sanctuary, because the famine did so prevail against them, that they were fain to disperse themselves, every man to his own place.

55 At that time Lysias heard say, that Philip, whom Antiochus the king, whiles he lived, had appointed to bring up his son Antiochus, that he might be king, 56 Was returned out of Persia and Media, and the king's host also that went with him, and that he sought to take unto him the ruling of the affairs.

57 Wherefore he went in all haste, and said to the king and the captains

60), defences of such strength that, soon after this, the Syrians destroyed them, though they had bound themselves by an oath to do nothing of the kind (v. 62). The advantage of the situation was great—the artificial bulwarks strong—the siege must in any case be long. If the place had been duly provisioned, it would have been in no danger, unless regularly invested, and besieged for months or years.

artillery.] Rather, "towers." (See note on v. 20.)

instruments to cast fire and stones.] Arrows with tow twisted round their heads, dipped in pitch, and set alight, were shot from catapults, to fire the works or dwellings of an enemy. (See Thucyd. ii. 75.) Stones were hurled from ballistæ to break down battlements, and crush their defenders.

52. they also.] I.e. the besieged.

made engines against their engines.] Such engines as those already mentioned (v. 51) were used for the defence no less than for the attack, and were mounted on the walls and towers of besieged places, whence they played upon the enemy with the advantage of a higher position. (See 2 Chr. xxvi. 15.)

53. their vessels being without victuals.] The same neglect to provide sufficient stores, which had lost Beth-zur (v. 49), now endangered Jerusalem. The author offers two excuses for it. (1) It was a sabbatical year; (2) The influx of Jews from distant parts, rescued from among the heathen by Simon (ch. v. 23) and Judas (ib. v. 45), had caused an unusual consumption, and so exhausted the magazines.

54. There were but a few left.] The garrison diminished in number day by day,—in part, no doubt, by the ordinary casualties of a siege, but mainly through desertion, the famine driving many to quit the place and seek safety in flight.

§ 4. LYSIAS, CALLED OFF TO ANTIOCH BY THE PROCEEDINGS OF PHILIP, MAKES PEACE WITH THE JEWS, BUT DOES NOT OBSERVE ITS TERMS.

55–63. Jerusalem was at the last gasp. The revolt seemed about to be crushed. Judas can have had no hope of relief, and must have been contemplating surrender, or death amid the enemy's ranks, when an unexpected event saved him, and with him his nation. Philip, the regent appointed by Epiphanes just before his decease, arrived at Antioch with the army which had accompanied Epiphanes to the Eastern provinces, was admitted into the town, and assumed the government of the kingdom. It was necessary to march against this new foe at once; and Lysias, without a moment's hesitation, resolved to make peace with the Jews. The terms he granted them were all that they could desire—they were to return to their allegiance, but were to be allowed the free observance of all their own laws and usages, as before the edict of Epiphanes (v. 59). Their fortifications were also to remain untouched. This last stipulation was, however, not kept (v. 62). Eupator (or rather Lysias), who must have been the real director of everything, when he saw the strength of the defences, "commanded to pull down the wall." This done, he marched his army off to Antioch (v. 63).

55. Philip.] See v. 14; and compare 2 Macc. ix. 29.

56. Was returned out of Persia and Media.] I.e. from the eastern provinces, into which Epiphanes had marched for the purpose of collecting money (ch. iii. 31, 37).

the king's host also that went with him.] Half the forces of the empire, according to ch. iii. 37.

57. he went in all haste, and said.] Rather, "he hastened to depart, and to say." His special haste was to depart, and set out

B. C. cir. 162. of the host and the company, We decay daily, and our victuals are but small, and the place we lay siege unto is strong, and the affairs of the kingdom lie upon us:

[1] Gr. give hands. 58 Now therefore let us [1]be friends with these men, and make peace with them, and with all their nation;

59 And covenant with them, that they shall live after their laws, as they did before: for they are therefore displeased, and have done all these things, because we abolished their laws.

60 So the king and the princes were content: wherefore he sent unto them to make peace; and they accepted thereof.

61 Also the king and the princes made an oath unto them: whereupon they went out of the strong hold.

62 Then the king entered into mount Sion; but when he saw the strength of the place, he brake his oath that he had made, and gave commandment to pull down the wall round about. B. C. cir. 1

63 Afterward departed he in all haste, and returned unto Antiochia, where he found Philip to be master of the city: so he fought against him, and took the city by force.

CHAPTER VII.

1 Antiochus is slain, and Demetrius reigneth in his stead. 5 Alcimus would be high priest, and complaineth of Judas to the king. 16 He slayeth threescore Assideans. 43 Nicanor is slain, and the king's forces are defeated by Judas. 49 The day of this victory is kept holy every year.

IN the hundred and one and fiftieth year [a]Demetrius the son of cir. 1 [a] 2 Ma 14. 1.

for Antioch; but to effect this, he had to persuade the king and the commanders. So he "hastened" also to speak to them. The power of a regent would seem not to have been absolute.

We decay daily, and our victuals are but small.] The besiegers, it would seem, suffered almost as much as the besieged. They also were ill-provisioned, and could obtain but little from the adjacent country, which had no crops on account of the sabbatical year. They, too, "decayed," or lost men, "daily" by casualties.

the affairs of the kingdom lie upon us.] Rather, "press upon us." The situation is pressing, and brooks no delay.

60. he sent unto them to make peace.] The author of the Second Book professes to give the letters which passed on the occasion (1) between Lysias and the Jews; (2) between Antiochus and Lysias; and (3) between Antiochus and the Jews (ch. xi. 16–33). But his documents seem to be forgeries. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 318, note [5], E. T.)

61. the king and the princes made an oath.] The treaty was concluded with all the customary forms. Oaths were interchanged. As the king was a minor, "the princes"—Lysias and the other generals—took the oath also.

they went out.] This may have been a condition, for the honour of the royal arms.

62. he brake his oath that he had made.] We must not impute the perjury to the king, who was a mere boy. The orders to destroy the wall were, no doubt, given by Lysias.

63. where he found Philip.] According to the writer of the Second Book, Philip, fearing Eupator, fled into Egypt, and found a refuge with Ptolemy Philometor (2 Macc. ix. 29). It is possible that he escaped after the siege of the city was begun.

CHAPTER VII.

§ 1. DEMETRIUS ASSUMES THE SYRIAN CROWN, AND KILLS EUPATOR AND LYSIAS.

1–5. Demetrius, first cousin of Eupator, and the son of the elder brother, had an undoubted claim to the Syrian throne, especially as he was grown up, while Eupator was a minor. His father had sent him, when a child, to Rome as a hostage; and he had been retained there ever since, despite his many remonstrances. At last, despairing of getting the Senate's permission to quit Rome, he secretly made his escape, sailed to Syria, was received with favour by the mass of the inhabitants, and having got Lysias and Eupator into his power, caused them to be put to death (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 47). He then reigned for some years without a rival, but was ultimately dispossessed by Alexander Balas, Eupator's half-brother.

1. In the hundred and one and fiftieth year.] The year B.C. 162–1.

Demetrius the son of Seleucus.] Demetrius was the only son, so far as appears, of Seleucus IV. (Philopator), who succeeded his

B. C. cir. 161.

Seleucus departed from Rome, and came up with a few men unto ‖a city of the sea coast, and reigned there.

‖ Tripolis, Jos. Ant. lib. 12. cap. 16.

2 And as he entered into the ‖palace of his ancestors, so it was, that his forces had taken Antiochus and Lysias, to bring them unto him.

‖ Gr. house of the kingdom of his father.

3 Wherefore, when he knew it, he said, Let me not see their faces.

4 So his host slew them. Now when Demetrius was set upon the throne of his kingdom,

5 There came unto him all the wicked and ungodly men of Israel, having Alcimus, who was desirous to be high priest, for their captain:

B. C. cir. 161.

6 And they accused the people to the king, saying, Judas and his brethren have slain all thy friends, and driven us out of our own land.

7 Now therefore send some man whom thou trustest, and let him go and see what havock he hath made among us, and in the king's land, and let him punish them with all them that aid them.

8 Then the king chose Bacchides, a friend of the king, who ruled father, Antiochus the Great, in B.C. 187–6, and was himself succeeded by Antiochus Epiphanes in B.C. 176–5. According to the strict law of primogeniture, as understood in modern times, he was the rightful king; but, as the crown had, on account of his minority at his father's death, passed to a brother, by the Macedonian law his title was disputable.

departed from Rome.] Made his escape secretly, as we learn from Polybius (xxxi. 19–23) and Appian (l. s. c.). The Senate preferred that Syria should be under the rule of a boy, and lent no encouragement to the claims of Demetrius. After consultation with Polybius, who was his private friend, and with others, he determined to depart clandestinely, and succeeded in effecting his purpose.

a city of the sea coast.] Demetrius landed at Tripolis in Phœnicia, according to the author of the Second Book (ch. xiv. 1), who is followed by Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 1).

reigned there.] I.e. "was proclaimed king." He does not appear to have remained at Tripolis more than a very short time.

2. he entered into the palace of his ancestors.] The royal palace of the Syrian kings was at Antioch. It was situated in the northern part of the city, close upon the Orontes.

his forces had taken Antiochus and Lysias.] Demetrius landed in Syria with but "a few men" (v. 1); but the Syrian army almost immediately declared in his favour. Eupator and Lysias were arrested by their own guards, who would have delivered them alive to the new monarch, but, on the intimation of his pleasure recorded in v. 3, put them to death.

§ 2. DEMETRIUS MAKES ALCIMUS HIGH PRIEST, AND SENDS BACCHIDES TO ARRANGE AFFAIRS IN JUDÆA.

4–9. On quitting Jerusalem with Eupator, Lysias had carried off the High Priest, Onias or Menelaus, and had caused him to be put to death, thus leaving the high priesthood vacant. The rightful successor to the office was Menelaus' son, Onias; but another claimant arose in the person of Alcimus, who was of a different family from Menelaus, but claimed to be descended from Aaron, and had had ancestors among the High Priests (2 Macc. xiv. 7). According to Josephus, Lysias invested Alcimus with the office ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 7); but our author evidently supposes him to have first received the appointment from Demetrius. Demetrius, at any rate, acknowledged him, and at his instigation sent Bacchides with a large army into Judæa, with orders to crush Judas and his party, and to instal Alcimus as governor of the country.

5. the wicked and ungodly men of Israel.] I.e. the men of the Hellenizing party. (See above, ch. i. 43, 52; ii. 44; iii. 8, &c.)

Alcimus.] Ewald identifies the name with the Hebrew "Eliakim" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 319, note [9], E. T.); but Josephus says that the original name of Alcimus was not Eliakim, but Jakim or Jehoiakim. In meaning the words are equivalents, but, as names, they were considered to be distinct and different (2 Kings xxiii. 34). Alcimus was a good Greek name, meaning "valiant."

was . . . their captain.] Rather, "their leader"—the chief man of the embassy, not a military commander.

6. they accused the people to the king.] By "the people" here, we must understand the patriots—that part of the nation which clung to the Law, and accepted Judas for their leader. It was true that Judas and his followers had pursued to the death those of their nation who took the opposite view and sided with the Syrians. (See ch. ii. 44; iii. 8.)

8. Bacchides, a friend of the king.] Josephus calls him "a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes" ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 2). He is not mentioned by the classical writers.

B. C. cir. 161.

beyond the flood, and was a great man in the kingdom, and faithful to the king.

9 And him he sent with that wicked Alcimus, whom he made high priest, and commanded that he should take vengeance of the children of Israel.

10 So they departed, and came with a great power into the land of Judea, where they sent messengers to Judas and his brethren with peaceable words deceitfully.

11 But they gave no heed to their words; for they saw that they were come with a great power.

12 Then did there assemble unto Alcimus and Bacchides a company of ‖scribes, to require justice.

‖ Or, officers, governors, chief men, or, men in authority.

13 Now the Assideans were the first among the children of Israel that sought peace of them:

B. C. cir. 161.

14 For said they, One that is a priest of the seed of Aaron is come with this army, and he will do us no wrong.

15 So he spake unto them peaceably, and sware unto them, saying, We will procure the harm neither of you nor your friends.

16 Whereupon they believed him: howbeit he took of them threescore men, and slew them in one day, according to the words which he wrote,

17 [b]The flesh of thy saints have they cast out, and their blood have they shed round about Jerusalem, and there was none to bury them.

[b] Ps. 79. 3.

18 Wherefore the fear and dread of them fell upon all the people, who who ruled beyond the flood.] I.e. "beyond the Euphrates." Josephus says that he was "governor of all Mesopotamia."

§ 3. The Attempt of Bacchides to pacify Judæa by Fraud and Treachery.

10–20. Bacchides seems to have hoped to end all by enticing Judas to a conference, and there seizing his person. When this plot failed, he had no further resource, except to exercise his arts of persuasion and treachery upon persons of less, indeed of scarcely any, importance. What result he expected from his massacres, it is hard to say. He must have wholly misunderstood the character of the Hebrews, if he thought that severities would terrify them into submission. Armed force he appears to have been afraid to use; he made no attack upon the army of Judas or upon the Temple fortress; and after doing the Syrian cause as much harm as was possible in the time, seemingly well content with his work, he left Jerusalem and returned to Antioch.

10. they sent messengers to Judas, &c.] To invite to a conference and there seize the persons of obnoxious leaders has been a favourite device of Orientals in all ages. So Tissaphernes seized the Greek generals after Cunaxa; so the Parthians got possession of Crassus after Carrhae; so the Affghans entrapped MacNaughten and his staff at the beginning of the great outbreak. Judas was more prudent and cautious than most commanders. He declined all offers of a parley, and maintained a vigilant defensive attitude, probably in the Temple fortress.

12. a company of scribes.] The "scribes" of this verse are probably to be connected with the "Assideans" (Khasidim) of the next. Though Judas had been too wary to be deceived, a portion of the "party of the Pious" (see note on ch. ii. 42) suffered themselves to be entrapped. From their secure position, either in the Temple fortress, or in some other fortified place, they sent a strong deputation of "scribes" to confer with Bacchides and Alcimus, and "adjust equitable terms of peace." It seemed to them impossible that one of their own nation, more especially one "of the seed of Aaron," should act treacherously towards them.

15. he spake unto them peaceably.] The mask was not thrown off at once. Alcimus bound himself by an oath in no respect to injure the deputies, and then suddenly arrested sixty of them, and put them to death. Josephus throws the blame of the proceeding on Bacchides ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 2): but no doubt he and Alcimus were equally in fault.

16. according to the words which he wrote.] It has been proposed to supply a nominative, as "Asaph," "David," "the Prophet"—and so some MSS. and versions. But the construction without a nominative is not unexampled, and may be explained as an ellipse, κατὰ τὸν λόγον ὃν ἔγραψεν [ὁ γράψας].

17. The flesh of thy saints, &c.] See Ps. lxxix. 2, 3, which is thought to have been written in the earlier part of the Maccabee period.

18. the fear and dread of them.] A com-

B. C. cir. 161.

said, There is neither truth nor ‖righteousness in them; for they have broken the covenant and oath that they made.

‖ Gr. judgment.

19 After this removed Bacchides from Jerusalem, and pitched his tents in Bezeth, where he sent and took many of the men that had forsaken him, and certain of the people also, and when he had slain them,

[c] Jer. 41. 7.

[c] he cast them into the great pit.

20 Then committed he the country to Alcimus, and left with him a power to aid him: so Bacchides went to the king.

21 But Alcimus ‖contended for the high priesthood.

B. C. cir. 161.

‖ Or, laboured to defend his high priesthood.

22 And unto him resorted all such as troubled the people, who, after they had gotten the land of Juda into their power, did much hurt in Israel.

23 Now when Judas saw all the mischief that Alcimus and his company had done among the Israelites, even above the heathen, 24 He went out into all the coasts of Judea round about, and took vengeance of them that had ‖revolted from him, so that they durst no more ‖go forth into the country.

‖ Or, fled from him to the enemy.

‖ Or, invade the country.

mon Hebrew pleonasm. (See Gen. ix. 2; Ex. xv. 16; Deut. ii. 25, xi. 25; Isa. viii. 13.)

19. pitched his tents in Bezeth.] Bezeth is probably the same as the Bezetha of later times, which was the name of the hill due north of the Temple-mount, on which a portion of the later city was built. We learn from Josephus that the word is a contraction of Beth-Zeth, which would mean "the house of the olive," and would imply that the hill was originally devoted to the cultivation of that tree. As it is a sort of continuation of the Mount of Olives, this may well have been so.

the men that had forsaken him.] Rather, "that had deserted from him." After the massacre related in v. 16, many of the Jews who had ranged themselves on his side, naturally enough, deserted the standard of Bacchides, and fled to strongholds. Of these we must suppose "the village of Beth-Zeth" (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 2) to have been one.

certain of the people also.] I.e. "of the original inhabitants of Beth-Zeth," who had offended him by harbouring the fugitives.

the great pit.] Φρέαρ is properly "a well," and may have the meaning in this place. The massacre of Cawnpore has made moderns familiar with such a disposal of the bodies of victims.

20. Then committed he the country to Alcimus.] Alcimus was left to be civil ruler, as well as High Priest. Indeed, as he was excluded from the Temple, his functions would be chiefly civil.

§ 3. ALCIMUS, BEING IN DIFFICULTIES, APPLIES FOR AID A SECOND TIME TO DEMETRIUS, WHO SENDS NICANOR WITH AN ARMY.

21–26. The situation of Alcimus was full of difficulty. He claimed to be High Priest, yet had no access to the Temple. He was nominally civil governor of Judæa, but found his authority overshadowed by that of Judas. Bacchides had in fact left him in the throes of a civil war, in which he found himself losing ground continually. "Judas and his company had gotten the upper hand" (v. 25). Under these circumstances, he had no resource but to make a second appeal to Demetrius, for more effectual aid against his adversary. Demetrius upon this sent Nicanor at the head of a considerable army, with orders to "destroy" the party of Judas.

21. Alcimus contended for the high priesthood.] Until he could obtain possession of the Temple, Alcimus felt his high priesthood insecure—a mere name, not a reality. Hence the need of his "contention."

22. all such as troubled the people.] Compare 1 Kings xviii. 18. The irreligious and idolatrous are always the true "troublers of Israel," even when authority is on their side, and their opponents may seem to be those who cause disturbance.

24. all the coasts of Judea.] All parts of the country. (Compare Deut. xvi. 4; Judg. xix. 29, &c.)

them that had revolted from him.] Literally, "that had deserted." Both sides considered that those who went over from their party to the other were "deserters," and merited death. (See v. 19.)

they durst no more go forth into the country.] "None of them dared any longer to shew themselves openly" (Ewald).

25. said all the worst of them that he could.] Literally, "accused them of evil deeds." In the eyes of Alcimus, and of Demetrius no less, all the gallant actions of Judas and his followers were "evil deeds"—acts of rebellion against lawful authority.

B. C. cir. 161.

25 On the other side, when Alcimus saw that Judas and his company ‖ had gotten the upper hand, and knew that he was not able ‖ to abide their force, he went again to the king, and said all the worst of them that he could.

‖ Or, were grown very strong.

‖ Gr. to abide them.

26 [d] Then the king sent Nicanor, one of his honourable princes, a man that bare deadly hate unto Israel, with commandment to destroy the people.

[d] 2 Mac. 14. 12.

cir. 161.

27 So Nicanor came to Jerusalem with a great force; and sent unto Judas and his brethren deceitfully with ‖ friendly words, saying, ‖ Gr. peaceable.

28 Let there be no battle between me and you; I will come with a few men, that I may ‖ see you in peace.

B. C. cir. 161.

‖ Gr. see your faces.

29 He came therefore to Judas, and they saluted one another peaceably. Howbeit the enemies were prepared to take away Judas by violence.

30 Which thing after it was known to Judas, to wit, that he came unto him with deceit, he was sore afraid of him, and would see his face no more.

31 Nicanor also, when he saw that his counsel was discovered, went out to ‖ fight against Judas beside ‖ Caphar-salama:

‖ Gr. meet Judas in battle.

‖ Or, Carphasalama.

26. the king sent Nicanor.] It is uncertain if this was the "Nicanor" of ch. iii. 36, who was selected to command in the Jewish war by Lysias. He was undoubtedly the person mentioned by Polybius (xxxi. 22, § 4) as among the friends of Demetrius at Rome, and as having accompanied him in his flight. (Cf. Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 4.) Josephus calls him "the best-affectioned and most faithful of Demetrius's friends." The author of the Second Book says, that he had been "master of the elephants" (2 Macc. xiv. 12).

a man that bare deadly hate unto Israel.] These words are curiously at variance with the representations of the writer of the Second Book, who makes Nicanor studiously mild towards the Jews at first (ch. xiv. 23–28), and says that he "loved Judas from his heart" (ib. v. 24). It has been supposed that his hatred arose from his having been defeated at Emmaus (ch. iv. 14, 15).

with commandment to destroy the people.] Compare above, ch. iii. 35, 36.

§ 4. The Expedition of Nicanor and its Results—The Battles of Caphar-salama and Adasa.

27–50. Nicanor, like Bacchides, seems to have thought at first, that he might effect the object of his expedition by craft and guile. He entered into negotiations with Judas, and even persuaded him to come to a conference, at which he intended to seize his person (v. 29). Judas, however, had guarded against the treachery by having soldiers at hand (2 Macc. xiv. 22), who would have repelled force with force; and the attempt therefore was not actually made. Failing here, the Greek general commenced hostilities, and engaged the forces of Judas at Caphar-salama on the Samaritan frontier, but was defeated with the loss of 5000 men (v. 31). He then endeavoured to induce his own party to surrender Judas by threats, that, if they refused, he would destroy the Temple (v. 35); but, finding that his menaces had no effect, he once more resorted to arms, and fell upon a small force which was encamped with Judas at Adasa. Here again, however, he was unsuccessful: his army suffered a complete defeat; and he was himself slain in the battle. Judæa had then "rest a little while" (v. 50).

27. with a great force.] The amount is nowhere stated. According to the author of the Second Book, thirty-five thousand were slain in the battle of Adasa (2 Macc. xv. 27); but the numbers of this writer cannot be trusted.

28. that I may see you.] Literally, "that I may see your faces." A common Hebraism.

29. the enemies were prepared to take away Judas.] Josephus says that Nicanor in the middle of the interview gave a signal to his subordinates to seize Judas ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 4). Judas, however, perceiving his danger, jumped up and flew to his friends. The writer of the Second Book notes that he had prepared his friends for the emergency (ch. xiv. 22).

31. beside Capharsalama.] This place is unknown to the Hebrew Scriptures. The first element of the word may compare with the "Caper" in Capernaum, which means "village," and the second with the "salem" in Jerusalem, which means "peace." In the Middle Ages we find a "Carvasalim" near Ramleh, on the Samaritan frontier, N.W. of Jerusalem, which is probably the same place. From 2 Macc. xv. 1 we learn that, about this time, "Judas and his brethren were in the strong places about Samaria."

B. C. cir. 161.

32 Where there were slain of Nicanor's side about five thousand men, and the rest fled into the city of David.

33 After this went Nicanor up to mount Sion, and there came out of the sanctuary certain of the priests and certain of the elders of the people, to salute him peaceably, and to shew him the burnt sacrifice that was offered for the king.

34 But he mocked them, and laughed at them, and ‖abused them shamefully, and spake proudly, ‖ Gr. defiled them.

35 And sware in his wrath, saying, Unless Judas and his host be now delivered into my hands, if ever I come again ‖in safety, I will burn up this house: and with that he went out in a great rage.

B. C. cir. 161.

‖ Gr. in peace.

36 Then the priests entered in, and stood before the altar and the temple, weeping, and saying,

37 Thou, O Lord, didst choose this house to be called by thy name, and to be a house of prayer and petition for thy people:

38 Be avenged of this man and his

32. the rest fled into the city of David.] The western portion of Jerusalem, which had always remained in the possession of the Syrians. (See ch. i. 33–38; iv. 41; vi. 18–26, &c.)

33. went Nicanor up to mount Sion.] Nicanor made a demonstration against the Temple fortress. He descended from the Akra, and "ascended" the Temple hill, and probably approached the gates, and demanded a conference with the authorities. Whether he was admitted within the enclosure into the great outer court, as the author of the Second Book supposes (2 Macc. xiv. 31–33), is perhaps doubtful. The statement here, that the priests "came out" to meet him, rather implies the contrary. But, on the other hand, we are told (in v. 35) that he "went out," so that seemingly he must have penetrated inside. It is, however, quite clear that he was at no time master of the fortress, which was held for Judas by the "priests" and "people."

there came out of the sanctuary.] "The sanctuary," τὰ ἅγια, may mean either the Temple, taken altogether, τὸ ἱερόν, or the sacred building in the centre of the inner court, ὁ ναός.

the elders of the people.] The Temple fortress sheltered at this time, not only a body of priests, but a "people," the families of those who were in the field with Judas. It also had, in all probability, a garrison. (See ch. iv. 61.)

to shew him the burnt sacrifice that was offered for the king.] The Jews did not as yet claim actual independence. Their demand was to live under their own laws and enjoy the free exercise of their own religion, while at the same time they were subjects of the Syrian king. They therefore, according to their universal practice when under foreign government, offered special sacrifices and prayers for the Syrian monarch. (See Ezra vi. 10; Jer. xxix. 7; Philo, 'Leg. ad Caium,' vol. ii. p. 592.)

34. he . . . abused them shamefully.] Literally, "he polluted them." Gorionides says, "by spitting upon them;" but this can be no more than a conjecture.

35. Unless Judas and his host be now delivered into my hands.] Nicanor appears to have thought that Judas was within the Temple fortress, and that the priests and elders had it in their power to deliver him up. This was not the case (2 Macc. xiv. 32). Judas was still with his army in the field.

I will burn up this house.] The author of the Second Book gives a somewhat different account. According to him, Nicanor "stretched out his right hand towards the Temple, and made an oath in this manner—If ye will not deliver me Judas as a prisoner, I will lay this temple of God even with the ground, and I will break down the altar, and erect a notable temple to Bacchus" (2 Macc. xiv. 33). The threat, however expressed, reminded those who heard it of the blasphemous menaces of Sennacherib. (See v. 41, and compare 2 Kings xviii. 29–35.)

he went out.] On the force of this expression, see the comment on v. 33.

36. the priests entered in.] We may understand this of the priests quitting the outer, and entering the inner, court. They would then, naturally, stand "before the altar and the Temple"—the altar being directly in front of the Temple building.

37. Thou, O Lord.] The word Κύριε is wanting in many MSS., and is probably not from the hand of the author, who systematically avoids the use of the holy Name. (See note on ch. iii. 22.)

didst choose this house, &c.] See Deut. xii. 5, 11, 14, &c.; 1 Kings xi. 36, xiv. 21, &c.

to be a house of prayer and petition.] See Solomon's dedication speech (1 Kings viii.

B. C. cir. 161.

host, and let them fall by the sword: remember their blasphemies, and suffer them not to continue any longer.

39 So Nicanor went out of Jerusalem, and pitched his tents in Beth-horon, where an host out of Syria met him.

40 But Judas pitched in Adasa with three thousand men, and there he prayed, saying,

[c] 2 Kings 19. 35. Isai. 37. 36. Ecclus. 48. 21. 2 Mac. 8. 19. & 15. 22.

41 [e] O Lord, when they that were sent from the king of the Assyrians blasphemed, thine angel went out, and smote an hundred fourscore and five thousand of them.

42 Even so destroy thou this host before us this day, that the rest may know that he hath spoken blasphemously against thy sanctuary, and judge thou him according to his wickedness. B. C. 161.

43 So the thirteenth day of the month Adar the hosts joined battle: but Nicanor's host was discomfited, and he himself was first slain in the battle.

44 Now when Nicanor's host saw that he was slain, they cast away their weapons, and fled.

45 Then ‖ they pursued after them a day's journey, from Adasa unto Gazera, sounding an alarm after them with their trumpets. ‖ Or, the Jews.

46 Whereupon they came forth out of all the towns of Judea round about, and closed them in; so that they, turning back upon them that pursued them, were all slain with the sword, and not one of them was left.

28–52), and compare Is. lxi. 7, Matt. xxi. 13, &c.

39. in Beth-horon.] On the situation of Beth-horon, see note on ch. iii. 16.

40. in Adasa.] According to Josephus, Adasa was 30 stades (3½ miles) distant from Beth-horon. Eusebius places it near Gophna (Jifna). Recent research has shewn that it lay at the junction of the two main lines of advance on Jerusalem from the north, not far from El-Jib (Gibeon).

with three thousand men.] This is a surprisingly small number, since we have found Judas previously at the head of a body of 10,000 (ch. iv. 29), and on one occasion, when he divided his forces into three parts, they exceeded 13,000 (ch. v. 20, 60). Small as the number is, however, Josephus reduces it still further, making it no more than 1000 ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 5). The forces on the other side he estimates (l. s. c.) at 9000. The author of the Second Book makes them 35,000 (2 Macc. xv. 27).

41. O Lord.] Here, again, as in v. 37, most MSS. omit Κύριε, which was probably not expressed by the original writer. (See note on v. 37.)

the king of the Assyrians.] I.e. Sennacherib. It has been observed already that Nicanor's menaces recalled to the minds of those who heard them the threats of Rabshakeh. It may be added, that Jewish tradition makes the destruction of Sennacherib's host to have taken place in the same region where Judas was at the present time encamped. This view, however, is not borne out by Scripture.

an hundred fourscore and five thousand.] See 2 Kings xix. 35.

42. the rest.] I.e. "our other enemies"—Syrians, apostate Jews, Edomites, Ammonites, &c.

43. the thirteenth day of the month Adar.] "Adar" corresponded to the latter part of February and the first three weeks of March. The thirteenth day of Adar was the day immediately preceding the two days' Feast of Purim, which was kept on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar (Esther viii. 21–32), the fourteenth day being known as "the day of Mordecai" (2 Macc. xv. 36). Henceforth three days were observed, the first of them being called "Nicanor's day."

45. a day's journey, from Adasa unto Gazera.] On the position of Gazera and its identity with the modern Tel-Jezar, see the comment on ch. iv. 15. The direct distance from Adasa is about 15 miles, which the turns and twists of the passes would increase to about 20—a good "day's journey."

sounding an alarm, &c.] Literally, "and they trumpeted after them with their signal trumpets." The notes of the trumpets announced victory, and gave a signal to the villagers and others to intercept the passes and cut off the retreat. (See the next verse.)

46. they came forth out of all the towns.] Rather, "villages" (κωμῶν).

closed them in.] Literally, "out-flanked them." (See Polyb. xi. 23, § 5; Plutarch, 'Vit. Brut.' § 23.)

B. C. 161. 47 Afterwards they took the spoils, and the prey, and smote off Nicanor's head, and his right hand, which he stretched out so proudly, and brought them away, and hanged them up toward Jerusalem.

48 For this cause the people rejoiced greatly, and they kept that day a day of great gladness.

f 2 Mac. 15. 36. 49 Moreover f they ordained to keep yearly this day, being the thirteenth of Adar.

50 Thus g the land of Juda was in rest a little while. B. C. cir. 161.

ch. 9. 57. & 14. 4.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Judas is informed of the power and policy of the Romans, 20 and maketh a league with them. 24 The articles of that league.

NOW Judas had heard of the fame of the Romans, that they were mighty and valiant men, and such as would lovingly accept all that joined themselves unto them,

47. they took the spoils, and the prey.] The inanimate and animate objects—women, children, and slaves—that the enemy had left behind him. For this sense of προνομὴ see the Septuagint version of Deut. xxi. 10.

smote off Nicanor's head.] This barbarous practice was common in antiquity. The Egyptian kings represent themselves as bringing home the heads of rebel enemies, suspended to their chariots (Lepsius, 'Denkmäler,' part iii. pl. 128 a) and even as smiting off their heads with their own hands (ib. pl. 61). The Philistines cut off Saul's head, and "sent it into their land round about" (1 Sam. xxxi. 9). Judith is represented as cutting off the head of Holofernes in his tent and carrying it away with her (Jud. xiii. 8–15). Xerxes had the corpse of Leonidas beheaded after Thermopylae (Herod. vii. 238). The similar indignity offered to the body of Pompey by the semi-barbarous Egyptians of the time is too well known to need more than simple mention.

and his right hand.] This was unusual. Right hands were sometimes cut off as a means of counting the slain; but the present instance does not come under this category. It must be ascribed wholly to the action of Nicanor in threatening the Temple with a gesture of his right hand (2 Macc. xvi. 33). The guilty right hand was cut off in the way of punishment.

hanged them up toward Jerusalem.] They were probably hung up on one of the Temple gates looking westward, toward the fortress and city occupied by the Syrians. The later traditions, and even the details of 2 Macc. xv. 32–35), are scarcely trustworthy. Such exposures naturally followed on the barbarities practised upon the corpses of enemies in the ancient world generally. (See the author's 'Hist. of Egypt,' vol. ii. p. 255; 1 Sam. xxxxi. 12; 'Behist. Inscr.' col. ii. par. 13, § 7; par. 14; § 16; &c.)

50. the land of Juda was in rest a little while.] A few weeks only. The second expedition of Bacchides followed on the defeat of Nicanor within a month at the utmost. (Compare ch. vii. 1, 43 with ch. ix. 1–3.)

CHAPTER VIII.

§ 1. JUDAS RECEIVES INFORMATION CONCERNING THE POWER AND GREATNESS OF THE ROMANS.

1–16. The account of the Romans contained in this passage is interesting, as shewing, not so much the amount of knowledge which Judas Maccabeus possessed of them, as the amount possessed by the writer of the Book, some thirty or forty years after the death of Judas. The picture is graphic, and, despite its inaccuracies (vv. 8, 15, 16), not unfaithful, presenting to us fairly enough the general outlines, at once of their national character, of their military history, and of their institutions. The writer evidently holds the nation in high respect and esteem. He recognises all its good qualities; he is apparently not aware of its bad ones. The policy of Judas in opening communications with the Romans has his approval. He expects nothing but good to result from it; he sees no peril as threatening either the religious life or the political independence of his people. Yet the facts stated in v. 13 might well have stirred some feelings of distrust and suspicion.

1. Judas had heard of the fame of the Romans.] The Romans first became known in the East as a great military power at the beginning of the second century B.C., by the war which they waged with Antiochus the Great. The battle of Magnesia, B.C. 190, established their reputation. The treaty which followed gave them a right, which they were not slow to use, of perpetual interference in the affairs of Asia. Their "commissioners" (legati) were constantly visiting the different courts, making demands and imposing conditions. It was a part of their policy to support all the weak states against the stronger ones, in order that no one power might swallow up the rest.

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 161. and make a league of amity with all that came unto them;

2 And that they were men of great valour. It was told him also of their wars and noble acts which they had done among the ‖Galatians, and how they had conquered them, and brought them under tribute;

‖ Or, Frenchmen.

B. C. 189.

3 And what they had done in the country of Spain, for the winning of the mines of the silver and gold which is there;

B. C. cir. 201.

4 And that by their policy and patience they had conquered ‖all the place, though it were very far from them; and the kings also that came against them from the uttermost part of the earth, till they had discomfited them, and given them a great overthrow, so that the rest did give them tribute every year:

‖ Or, every place.

mighty and valiant men.] Literally, "mighty in strength," a phrase equivalent to the "mighty men of valour" of the Canonical Books (Judg. vi. 12, xi. 1; 1 Kings xi. 28; 2 Chr. xvii. 17, &c.). such as would lovingly accept, &c.] The Romans had received into alliance Attalus of Pergamus, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, Ptolemy Philometor, and the Rhodians. They were on such terms with Demetrius Soter as made it probable that they would accept an offer of friendship from any state that was hostile to him.

2. they were men of great valour.] This clause is repeated from v. 1, either by accident, or for the sake of emphasising it.

their wars . . . among the Galatians.] The Galatians of Asia Minor were the remnant of that vast body of emigrants which entered Macedonia from the valley of the Danube in B.C. 279, and for a time threatened to overwhelm Macedonian and Greek civilisation. Repulsed at last, they made their way into Thrace, and thence passed over into Asia Minor, some of them on the invitation of Nicomedes (B.C. 277), others of their own accord. Here they settled in Northern Phrygia (which became "Galatia") and continued for nearly a century an annoyance and a terror to their neighbours. At last, in B.C. 189, the year after Magnesia, Cn. Manlius Vulso undertook an expedition against them, which was completely successful, and in a great measure put a stop to their ravages. (See Liv. xxxviii. 37; Polyb. xxi. 38, &c.)

brought them under tribute.] This is, probably, an inaccuracy. The Romans withdrew from Asia altogether after the campaign of B.C. 189, and left the Galatians to themselves, merely enjoining upon them the discontinuance of their constant raids (Liv. xxxvii. 40).

3. what they had done in the country of Spain.] The conquest of Spain was effected, nominally, in the course of the Second Punic War (B.C. 218–201); and its cession was one of the conditions enforced on the Carthaginians in the last-named year. But the Celtic and Iberian tribes were not really subdued till much later, resistance being only terminated by the campaigns of Agrippa and Carisius in B.C. 27–19.

for the winning of the mines of the silver and gold.] The wealth of Spain in the precious metals was no doubt the main reason of its possession being coveted, alike by the Romans and the Carthaginians. Silver was especially plentiful (Polyb. xxxiv. 9, § 8); and the silver-mines of New Carthage (Carthagena) formed the great attraction which originally drew the Carthaginians to the Spanish shores. Gold was also obtained in considerable quantities; and Pliny goes so far as to say, that "almost the whole of Spain abounds with mines of lead, iron, copper, silver, and gold" ('H. N.' xxxiii. 21). The influx of the precious metals into Italy, chiefly from Spain, after the close of the Second Punic War, was very great, and caused a marked decline in their value.

4. by their policy and patience they had conquered all the place.] This was certainly not true at the time when Judas sent his embassy. The name "Spain" applied to the whole of the peninsula, which was not entirely reduced, as already observed, until B.C. 19. But the reduction of the Lusitani in B.C. 140, and of Numantia in B.C. 133, had produced a cessation of open resistance at the time when our author wrote.

though it were very far from them.] It is remarkable that the distant Spain was conquered, while the nearer Gaul remained independent, and indeed unattacked, the Roman armies being sent to Spain by sea.

kings . . . from the uttermost part of the earth.] The author has perhaps in his mind the invasions of Italy by Pyrrhus (B.C. 280) and Hannibal (B.C. 218), whom he may regard as a king, though, strictly speaking, he was only a general. But he has evidently no more than a vague acquaintance with the Roman military history.

a great overthrow.] No particular battle is intended, but rather the whole course of

B. C. 197. 5 Beside this, how they had discomfited in battle Philip, and Perseus, king of the ‖ Citims, with others that lifted up themselves against them, and had overcome them:

‖ Or, Macedonians.

6 How also Antiochus the great king of Asia, that came against them in battle, having an hundred and twenty elephants, with horsemen, and chariots, and a very great army, was discomfited by them; B. C. 190.

7 And how they took him alive, and covenanted that he and such as reigned after him should pay a great tribute, and give hostages, and that which was agreed upon,

Roman victory, the word πληγὴ being used "distributively" (Grimm).

5. how they had discomfited in battle Philip.] Philip III., king of Macedon, made alliance with Hannibal in the year B.C. 215, and went to war with the Romans in the year following. After seven years of not very successful warfare, he was glad to conclude a separate peace in B.C. 207. In B.C. 200, however, he voluntarily renewed the war, but after a short struggle was completely defeated by the Roman general, Flamininus, at Cynocephalæ, in Thessaly, B.C. 197. This is no doubt the "discomfiture" whereto our author alludes.

and Perseus.] Perseus, son and successor of Philip III., and last king of Macedon, was forced into a war with Rome against his will in B.C. 171, and, after three years of desultory fighting, suffered complete defeat at the hands of L. Æmilius Paullus in the great battle of Pydna, which extinguished the Macedonian monarchy. (Polyb. xxix. 17; Liv. xliv. 40, et seqq.) king of the Citims.] The Citim, Chittim, or Citæans, were, properly, the inhabitants of the town called Citium (Κίτιον), in Cyprus; but the Hebrew writers had from the time of Moses (Gen. x. 4; Num. xxiv. 24) been accustomed to use the term in a wider sense, either for the Cyprians, or even for the inhabitants of the isles and coasts of Greece generally (Is. xxiii. 1, 12; Jer. ii. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Dan. xi. 30; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' i. 6, § 1, &c.). Compare above ch. i. 1, and the comment ad loc.

6. Antiochus, the great king of Asia.] Antiochus III., son of Seleucus Callinicus, ascended the Syrian throne in B.C. 223, and reigned thirty-six years, dying B.C. 187. He is called "the Great King of Asia," as representing in the extent and geographical position of his dominions the old Persian monarchs, to whom the title of "Great King" had attached for more than two centuries. He assumed as his distinctive epithet the term ὁ Μέγας—"the Great," and is generally so designated by the classical historians (Polyb. xx. 8; Appian, 'Syriac.' § 66; Cic. 'Orat. pro Sextio,' § 27, &c.).

that came against them in battle, having an hundred and twenty elephants.] Antiochus III. first engaged the Romans with a small force at Thermopylæ in B.C. 192 (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 18–20), and suffered a severe defeat; but the present reference is not to this conflict, where only a few elephants were present, but to the far more important battle of Magnesia—one of the "decisive battles of the world"—in which the whole strength of the Syrian kingdom was pitted against Rome, and proved unequal to the encounter. The elephants brought into the field on this occasion were probably all that were available, and formed a conspicuous feature of the engagement (Liv. xxxvii. 39; Appian, 'Syriac.' § 32); but their number, according to Livy, did not exceed fifty-four.

with horsemen, and chariots.] The "horsemen" in the army of Antiochus are said by Livy (xxxix. 40) to have exceeded 11,700, of whom 6000 were clothed in heavy armour, and mounted on armoured horses. The chariots carried scythes at their axles, and were greatly feared by the adversaries of the Syrians, but actually caused most damage to their own side (App. 'Syriac.' § 33).

a very great army.] Amounting to 170,000 men, according to Appian ('Syriac.' § 32, ad init.).

7. they took him alive.] This is contrary to the fact. Antiochus fled from the field of battle to Sardis, thence to Celænæ, and thence to Antioch (ib. § 36). His ambassadors concluded peace with Rome in the course of the same year (B.C. 190).

and covenanted that he . . . should pay a great tribute.] Antiochus agreed to pay down 500 Eubœic talents, to pay 2500 more on the ratification of the treaty by the senate, and further to send to Rome 1000 talents yearly for the next twelve years (Liv. xxxviii. 39; Appian, § 38). This annual payment might be viewed as a (temporary) "tribute."

such as reigned after him.] Antiochus the Great outlived the battle of Magnesia by only three years. His obligations, consequently, had to be discharged by his successors, Seleucus Philopator, and Antiochus Epiphanes. The payments were not made with regularity, and we find them running on into the reign of Epiphanes, who made the last remittance under the treaty in B.C. 173, seventeen years after Magnesia (Liv. xlii. 6).

B. C. 190. 8 And the country of India, and Media, and Lydia, and of the goodliest countries, which they took of him, and gave to king Eumenes:

9 Moreover how the Grecians had determined to come and destroy them;

10 And that they, having knowledge thereof, sent against them a certain captain, and fighting with them slew many of them, and carried away captives their wives and their children, and spoiled them, and took possession of their lands, and pulled down their strong holds, and brought them to be their servants unto this day:

B. C. cir. 190.

B. C. 146.

and give hostages.] Twenty hostages were required, with liberty to the Romans to select whom they pleased (Appian, § 38). Among those chosen was Epiphanes, the younger son of Antiochus the Great, who was afterwards exchanged for Demetrius, his nephew.

and that which was agreed upon.] The word thus translated (διαστολή) is rare in Hellenistic, and not very common in classical, Greek. In Ex. viii. 23, it signifies "division," or "difference;" but that sense will not suit here. Some suppose the meaning here to be "exchange," since the hostages might be exchanged for fresh ones from time to time (Appian, l. s. c.). Others suggest the rendering, "a portion of his kingdom." But the word has nowhere else either of these senses.

8. India, and Media, and Lydia.] India proper was at no time included within the dominions of Antiochus the Great, and therefore could not have been ceded by him to Rome. His furthest eastern possession was Arachosia, a portion of Affghanistan. Media and Lydia were under his rule, the former permanently, the latter from B.C. 221 to 214. But Media is not mentioned as ceded by any other writer, and lay too far to the east to have been made over to Eumenes. Attempts have been made to save our author's credit by turning "India" into "Ionia," and "Media" into "Mysia;" but the simple fact seems to be that he had no accurate knowledge of any history which was not immediately connected with that of the Jews. He is correct in saying that the Romans compelled Antiochus to cede to them a portion of his dominions, and that the countries ceded were attached by Rome to the kingdom of Eumenes; he is mistaken as to the territories which thus changed masters. What Antiochus ceded was all Asia north of the Taurus (Liv. xxxvii. 44). The greater part of this tract Rome gave to Eumenes (ib. 56).

of the goodliest countries.] Literally, "of their goodliest countries" (ἀπὸ τῶν καλλίστων χωρῶν αὐτῶν). It is proposed to read αὐτοῦ ("his") for αὐτῶν; but the change is unnecessary. "Their" refers to the Syrians. On the goodliness of the countries yielded, see Herod. i. 142; and compare Sir C. Fellows's 'Asia Minor,' pp. 16, 22, 27, &c.

king Eumenes.] This was Eumenes II., the eldest son and successor of Attalus I., fourth king of Pergamus, one of the lesser kingdoms formed out of the dominions of Alexander the Great. From a small principality this kingdom became under Eumenes II. the principal power in Asia Minor, Rome rewarding his services at Magnesia and elsewhere with the gift of all the territory that she had taken from Antiochus the Great, except Lycia and part of Caria, which were assigned to the Rhodians.

9. how the Grecians had determined to come and destroy them.] This representation of the grounds of quarrel between the Romans and the Greeks breathes the spirit of a thoroughgoing partisan of the former. In reality, it was Rome which aimed at destroying Greece, not Greece which even dared to think of destroying Rome. The Ætolians indeed, on one occasion, threatened to invade Italy, and give an answer to the Roman demands on the banks of the Tiber (Liv. xxxv. 33); but the real aggressor in the contest was Rome, and it was Rome which insisted on carrying matters to the last extremity.

10. a certain captain.] Manius Acilius Glabrio, who was sent against the Ætolians in B.C. 191, has been looked upon as the "captain" here spoken of: but the rest of the verse points, not to the Ætolian war of B.C. 194–190, but to the final struggle of the Achæans in B.C. 146. If we understand the passage in this sense, the "captain" will have to be regarded as L. Mummius, who crushed Grecian independence at Leucopetra; and the author will have been guilty of an anachronism.

carried away captives their wives and their children.] On the capture of Corinth, all the full-grown men were put to death, while the women and children were sold to be slaves (Justin, xxxiv. 2). Achæa was reduced into the form of a Roman province, and the last remnant of Grecian independence was swept away.

pulled down their strong holds.] The fortifications of Thebes and Chalcis were destroyed in the last Achæan war; Corinth was burnt; and the other strongholds generally were dismantled.

B. C. cir. 170.

11 It was told him besides, how they destroyed and brought under their dominion all other kingdoms and isles that at any time resisted them;

12 But with their friends and such as relied upon them they kept amity: and that they had conquered kingdoms both far and nigh, insomuch as all that heard of their name were afraid of them:

13 Also that, whom they would help to a kingdom, those reign; and whom again they would, they displace: finally, that they were greatly exalted:

B. C. cir. 170.

14 Yet for all this none of them wore a crown, or was clothed in purple, to be magnified thereby:

15 Moreover how they had made for themselves a senate house, wherein three hundred and twenty men sat

11. all other kingdoms.] As that of Demetrius of Pharos, conquered in B.C. 219; Cis-Alpine Gaul, conquered in B.C. 191; Liguria, conquered in B.C. 154; Lusitania, conquered in B.C. 140, &c.

and isles.] Sicily was ceded to Rome by the Carthaginians at the close of the First Punic War, B.C. 241. Sardinia was seized in B.C. 238, and ceded the next year. Corsica was annexed in B.C. 236. Corcyra became Roman about B.C. 228.

12. with their friends and such as relied upon them they kept amity.] This, again, is the estimate of a partisan. Rome's principle was to favour her friends, so long as she needed them; to cast them aside, so soon as she could dispense with their services. Each friend in turn becomes an enemy, when he has ceased to be valuable, and is swallowed up as Ulysses would have been by Polyphemus, if he had not made his escape. But at the time when our author wrote, this was not generally recognised. The aggrandizement of Eumenes and the Rhodians after Magnesia placed the conduct of Rome towards her allies in a very favourable light.

all that heard of their name were afraid of them.] Signal indications of the alarm felt, even by the most powerful kings, are seen in the submission of Epiphanes to the dictation of Popillius (Liv. xlv. 12) and the murder of Hannibal by Prusias at the first hint that Rome was displeased at his harbouring her enemy (ib. xxxix. 51).

13. whom they would help to a kingdom, those reign.] From about the year B.C. 169 Rome acted as arbiter among the rival claimants of the Egyptian throne. In Asia Minor, from the date of the battle of Magnesia (B.C. 190) her influence was frequently employed to establish or displace monarchs. Alexander Balas owed his throne in a great measure to the hostility of Rome towards Demetrius. Nicomedes II. of Bithynia, Ariarathes V. of Cappadocia, and others, succeeded in establishing themselves, because Rome favoured their claims.

14. Yet for all this none of them wore a crown.] To an Oriental this seemed the most extraordinary fact of all—royal power exercised, yet the insignia of royalty carefully eschewed—the State everything, the individual nothing. Crowns of gold were continually sent to Rome as acknowledgments of sovereignty by the Eastern communities (Polyb. xxii. 17, § 4; xxiv. 1, § 7; xxviii. 18, § 3, &c.). These, however, were not appropriated by any individuals, but went into the public treasury.

or was clothed in purple.] Purple first appears as a specially royal colour in the Book of Judges, where we hear of the "purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian" whom Gideon slew (Judg. viii. 26). It does not appear to have been worn by the Assyrian monarchs, but was first brought into general repute by being selected for their wear by the Median kings (Xen. 'Cyrop.' i. 3, § 2). From the Medes the Persians adopted it (ibid. viii. 3, § 13); and from them it passed to the Greco-Macedonians (Q. Curt. 'Vit. Alex. Magn.' vi. 6), and ultimately to the Romans. Though no Roman of the times of the republic clothed himself in purple habitually, it was an ordinary colour of the paludamentum or general's cloak, the emblem of supreme command.

15. a senate house, wherein three hundred and twenty men sat.] The number of the Roman Senate was at no time legally fixed at three hundred and twenty members. The original number was 100 (Liv. i. 8)—the complete number under the monarchy, 300 (Dionys. Hal. iii. 67; Liv. ii. 1). No further augmentation was formally made until the dictatorship of Sulla, when he arbitrarily increased the Senate to between 500 and 600. Our author's estimate of 320 may be a simple mistake, or it may have arisen from the fact that in his time the actual number, including the two classes of full senators and persons having a right to a seat from their having served certain offices, was commonly about 320. (See Dr. W. Smith's 'Dict. of Gk. and Rom. Antiq.' p. 1018; 2nd edit.)

B. C. cir. 161. in council daily, consulting alway for the people, to the end they might be well ordered:

16 And that they committed their government to one man every year, who ruled over all their country, and that all were obedient to that one, and that there was neither envy nor emulation among them.

17 In consideration of these things, Judas chose Eupolemus the son of John, the son of Accos, and Jason the son of Eleazar, and sent them to Rome, to make a league of amity and confederacy with them, B. C. cir. 161.

18 And to intreat them that they would take the yoke from them; for they saw that the kingdom of daily.] This statement is also inaccurate. The Senate sat regularly, only on the Calends, Nones, and Ides of each month (Cic. 'Ad Q. Fratrem,' ii. 13); though extraordinary meetings might be convoked, on any day that was not nefastus, by the proper magistrate. Continuous sittings occurred only in the month of February, when audience was given to foreign ambassadors de die in diem; but this practice belongs only to the last period of the Republic. It may, however, have misled the writer.

16. they committed their government to one man every year.] Another mistake, but one which foreigners were not unlikely to make. The two consuls were ordinarily required sortiri provincias, "to cast lots for their respective provinces;" and their spheres were for the most part not only distinct, but distant one from the other. The Orientals would never be brought into contact with more than one consul at a time. It is unnecessary to suppose a reference to the temporary and occasional dictatorship.

there was neither envy nor emulation among them.] This view of the Roman polity is far too rose-coloured. In addition to the old rivalry of patrician and plebeian, and the constant struggle between consuls and tribunes, there was not infrequently a jealousy felt by the consuls one towards the other, which seriously interfered with the right conduct of affairs. In the early part of the Second Punic War, the rivalry between Servilius and Flaminius, Æmilius Paullus and Terentius Varro, had very disastrous consequences. Even a "Master of the Knights" was occasionally a thorn in the side of a dictator (Liv. xxii. 14, 27–29).

§ 2. EMBASSY SENT BY JUDAS TO THE ROMANS, AND TREATY CONCLUDED BETWEEN THE TWO NATIONS.

17–30. The determination of Judas to ask the aid of Rome was a piece of worldly policy which seemed prudent at the time, and which for many years had no ill consequences, but which implied a lack of simple earnest faith, and which ultimately led to the destruction of the Jewish state. Humanly speaking, and apart from a miraculous deliverance, Rome must no doubt have in the end absorbed the Israelite community: but it is to be regretted, for the sake of Judas himself, with his general nobility of character, that he was not above "trusting to an arm of flesh," and calling in a foreign power to give the help which could only have been given effectually by Jehovah. The history of his own nation might have warned him how fatal was the step he took. The appeals of Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvi. 7), and of Hezekiah to Merodach-Baladan (ib. xx. 13), had produced the most unfortunate results. A protector naturally becomes a sovereign. Had Judas known a little more of the real history of the Roman State, he would have recognised the fact, that he was calling in the wolf to mount guard over the sheep. As it was, he appears to have been deceived by the conduct of Rome towards Eumenes, which seemed disinterested, and which had vastly aggrandized the kingdom of Pergamus. (See v. 8.)

17. In consideration of these things.] These words are interpolated by our translators. The Greek has simply καί—the original had doubtless the mere vau connective.

Judas chose Eupolemus . . . and Jason.] It has been remarked (Stanley) that these names are Greek, and inferred that "Judas, with his usual sagacity, chose his envoys, not from the stricter, but from the free-minded section of his nation."

the son of John.] This John is mentioned in 2 Macc. iv. 11, as having been the intermediary by means of whom special privileges had been obtained for the Jews from Antiochus the Great. His son, Eupolemus, is identified by some with the writer on Jewish history, so largely quoted by Alexander Polyhistor. (See the fragments of Polyhistor in C. Müller's 'Fr. Hist. Graec.' vol. iii.)

Accos.] This is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Hakkoz, or Hakkots, a common priestly name (1 Chr. xxiv. 10; Ezra ii. 61; Neh. iii. 4, 21).

18. to intreat them that they would take the yoke from them.] The embassy was probably sent before the defeat of Nicanor,

B. C. cir. 161. the Grecians did oppress Israel with servitude.

19 They went therefore to Rome, which was a very great journey, and came into the senate, where they spake and said, 20 Judas Maccabeus with his brethren, and the people of the Jews, have sent us unto you, to make a confederacy and peace with you, and that we might be registered your confederates and friends.

21 So that matter pleased the Romans well.

22 And this is the copy of the epistle which the senate wrote back again in tables of brass, and sent to Jerusalem, that there they might have by them a memorial of peace and confederacy: B. C. cir. 161.

23 Good success be to the Romans, and to the people of the Jews, by sea and by land for ever: the sword also and enemy be far from them.

24 If there come first any war upon the Romans or any of their confederates throughout all their dominion, when the cause of the patriotic party seemed well-nigh desperate.

the kingdom of the Grecians.] I.e. the Greco-Macedonian kingdom established in Syria under the Seleucidæ.

19. They went therefore to Rome, which was a very great journey.] The journey had to be made by sea, and followed the line of the coast, except that the Ægean and the Adriatic might be crossed at their mouths, the former by way of the Cyclades, or of Cnidus, Carpathus, and Crete, the latter from Corcyra to Iapygia. The voyage of St. Paul from Cæsarea to Puteoli seems to have taken about six months; but half of this time was spent at Melita. Three months was probably about the usual time spent in the passage.

and came into the senate.] The practice of introducing foreign ambassadors into the Senate, and allowing them to speak for themselves, is well attested by the classical writers (Liv. vii. 20; viii. 1, 5, &c.; Polyb. xxxi. 6, 14; xxxii. 1, 7, 24, &c.; Cic. 'Ad Q. Fratrem', ii. 13, &c.). It was the established usage during the entire period of the Republic.

where they spake and said.] Literally, "where they answered and said." But our translators are probably right as to the meaning. See the comment on ch. ii. 17.

20. Judas Maccabeus, &c.] It must not be supposed that this is all that the ambassadors said. No doubt, they fully stated their case, and recommended the alliance by all the arguments which they thought likely to be effectual. But the sum of all was the request to be inscribed on the list of Rome's allies. We are not to suppose that there was an official "register;" the names and number of the allies were known by means of the treaties preserved in the Tabularium of the Capitol.

22. this is the copy of the epistle which the senate wrote back again.] The reply of the Senate was to send back a duplicate copy of the treaty, which they formally concluded with the Jewish ambassadors, for the Jews to preserve in their own archives, while they retained another similar document themselves. Duplicate treaties on plates of metal were as old as the time of Rameses the Great (B.C. 1350), whose treaty with the Hittites in his twenty-first year was inscribed on two tablets of silver ('Records of the Past,' vol. iv. pp. 27–32).

in tables of brass.] Rather, "on tablets of bronze." The custom of inscribing treaties on bronze tablets was ancient at Rome. Polybius says that the various treaties between Rome and Carthage, commencing with the one concluded in the first year of the Republic, were preserved to his day in the Capitol ἐν χαλκώμασι (iii. 26, § 1). Dionysius states that the laws of the Twelve Tables were engraved on brazen pillars (στήλαις χαλκαῖς, x. 57); and Pollux says that laws of all kinds, both sacred and profane, were inscribed similarly (viii. 128).

23. Good success be to the Romans, and to the people of the Jews.] A translation, as has been well noted (Grimm), of the old Roman formula, "Quod bonum, faustum, felixque sit populo Romano et genti Judæorum," with which the treaty would naturally begin.

24–30. We have here a specimen of the sort of treaty which Rome was at all times ready to conclude with any independent power, beyond the line of her frontiers, but within the sphere of her activity. To such powers she was always ready to promise protection and assistance, in return for an engagement on their part, to help her with a contingent when required (v. 25), and to render no aid to her enemies (v. 26). A studious appearance of equity and moderation is observable in such documents. See the

B. C. cir. 161.

25 The people of the Jews shall help them, as the time shall be appointed, with all their heart:

26 Neither shall they give any thing unto them that make war upon them, or aid them with victuals, weapons, money, or ships, as it hath seemed good unto the Romans; but they shall keep their covenants without taking any thing therefore.

27 In the same manner also, if war come first upon the nation of the Jews, the Romans shall help them with all their heart, according as the time shall be appointed them:

28 Neither shall victuals be given to them that take part against them, or weapons, or money, or ships, as it hath seemed good to the Romans; but they shall keep their covenants, and that without deceit.

B. C. cir. 161.

29 According to these articles did the Romans make a covenant with the people of the Jews.

30 Howbeit if hereafter the one party or the other shall think meet to add or diminish any thing, they may do it at their pleasures, and whatsoever they shall add or take away shall be ratified.

31 And as touching the evils that Demetrius doeth to the Jews, we have written unto him, saying, Wherefore hast thou made thy yoke heavy upon our friends and confederates the Jews?

32 If therefore they complain any more against thee, we will do them justice, and fight with thee by sea and by land.

three treaties with Carthage given by Polybius (iii. 22, 24, and 25).

25. as the time shall be appointed.] I.e. on the day, and in the manner that Rome shall appoint. Rome would not always, nor indeed very often, ask aid.

with all their heart.] Literally, "with a full heart"—i.e. heartily and zealously.

26. Neither shall they give any thing.] A common stipulation, generally expressed more briefly by the phrase, "nulla ope juvato," or "neu commeatu, neu qua alia ope juvato." (See Liv. xxxviii. 11, 38, &c.)

as it hath seemed good unto the Romans.] These words seem to imply that Rome had a list of "contraband of war" extending beyond the four items enumerated, which are given as suggestive, not as exhaustive. The Jews were not to supply to nations at war with Rome any of the articles on the Roman list.

without taking any thing therefore.] Without expecting to be paid for it.

28. without deceit.] The Latin form was, no doubt, "sine dolo malo." (Comp. Liv. xxxviii. 11.)

30. Howbeit, &c.] This was a supplemental clause, and is therefore separated off by the parenthetic v. 29 from the rest of the treaty. Such a power to add to, or take from, the provisions of treaties by mutual agreement was often provided, though occasionally it gave rise to suspicion and complaint (Thucyd. v. 23, 29), as do "secret clauses" in modern treaties.

§ 3. THREATENING MESSAGE SENT BY ROME TO DEMETRIUS.

31–32. If the treaty was to give any immediate relief to the Jews, it was necessary that the fact of its conclusion should be notified to Demetrius. Rome gave the notification in the rudest and bluntest way. Ever since Magnesia, she had domineered over the Syrian kings; and Demetrius was especially odious to her, since he had assumed the crown without her authorisation, and against her wishes (Polyb. xxxi. 19–23).

31. we have written unto him, saying.] Here again we are not to suppose that the writer gives the entire rescript. Though the forms of ancient diplomacy were simpler and more direct than those which prevail at the present day, still for the most part proposals, and even commands, were wrapt up in a number of unmeaning phrases, which softened them to the recipient. Here, the main thing was to intimate that the status of the Jews was changed—they had become "friends and confederates" of the Romans. Rome therefore could not suffer them to be oppressed. But the question, "Wherefore hast thou made thy yoke heavy?" &c., can scarcely have been put so barely as it is expressed in the text.

32. If therefore they complain any more.] Rather, "if they apply to us any more." The application would, of course, involve a complaint.

we will . . . fight with thee by sea and by land.] "Terra marique pugnabimus contra te." This was at least explicit. Demetrius was

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

CHAPTER IX.

1 Alcimus and Bacchides come again with new forces into Judea. 7 The army of Judas flee from him, 17 and he is slain. 30 Jonathan is in his place, 40 and revengeth his brother John's quarrel. 55 Alcimus is plagued, and dieth. 70 Bacchides maketh peace with Jonathan.

B. C. cir. 161. FURTHERMORE when Demetrius heard that Nicanor and his host were slain in battle, [1] he sent Bacchides and Alcimus into the land of Judea the second time, and with them [2] the chief strength of his host:

2 Who went forth by the way that leadeth to [3] Galgala, and pitched their tents before Masaloth, which is in Arbela, and after they had won it, they slew much people.

3 Also the first month of the hun-

[1] Gr. he added, or, proceeded to send.

[2] Or, the right wing.

[3] Or, Galilea.

told what he had to expect. Rome, however, was in no hurry to carry out her threats. She had numerous wars on her hands, and waited with more prudence than boldness until the appearance of a pretender to the Syrian crown enabled her to wreak her vengeance on Demetrius without risking too much. (See ch. x. 1–50.) Meanwhile the Jews suffered at the hands of the Syrians as much as ever, or even more grievously (ch. ix. 1–66).

CHAPTER IX.

§ 1. RENEWED ATTACK UPON JUDÆA BY BACCHIDES AND ALCIMUS—DEFEAT OF JUDAS AT ELEASA—HIS DEATH AND BURIAL.

1–22. The application to Rome was made too late to be of any service to Judas. While his ambassadors were on their way to Italy, Demetrius made a fresh effort. Nicanor being dead, Bacchides was a second time intrusted with the command, and Alcimus, whom the Hellenizing party among the Jews acknowledged as High Priest, accompanied him. The "strength" of the Syrian army (v. 1)—twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse (v. 4)—was sent into Palestine, Masaloth was taken (v. 2), and Judas challenged to an engagement. As at Adasa against Nicanor (ch. vii. 40), so now, Judas was unable to muster more than 3000 men (v. 5); and these were so faint-hearted that their number continually diminished by desertions, until no more than 800 were left. The inclination of these 800 was to retire (v. 9), and probably to disperse; but Judas would not hear of such an end to all his efforts, and preferred to resist to the last. With his small band he engaged the hosts of Syria at Eleasa, not far from Jerusalem, and, after a battle which lasted all day, and which seemed at one time about to terminate in his favour (v. 15), he suffered complete defeat, and with the greater part of his troops was slain (v. 18). His two most famous brothers, Jonathan and Simon, obtained possession of his body, and buried him in his ancestral sepulchre at Modeïn, with a funeral ceremony which lasted "many days" (v. 20). Such was the heroic end of the first and greatest of the Maccabees, the life and soul of the insurrection during the space of seven years.

1. Nicanor and his host were slain in battle.] Compare ch. vii. 43, 44, where we learn that the greater part of the host escaped.

he sent Bacchides and Alcimus . . . the second time.] On the previous sending of Bacchides and Alcimus, and their respective positions, see ch. vii. 8, 9, and the comment ad loc.

the chief strength of his host.] Literally, "the right wing." This is explained to mean the half of the Syrian army which guarded the countries on the right bank of the Euphrates. (Compare ch. iii. 32–37.) The strength of that division had, however, been seven thousand horse and forty thousand foot a few years previously (ch. iii. 39).

2. by the way that leadeth to Galgala.] "Galgala" seems to be the same as "Galilee" (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 11); and the meaning is, that the expedition was sent by land, and entered Palestine on the north, not (as former ones) by sea to the western coast. (See ch. iii. 40; vi. 31; &c.)

Masaloth.] It is conjectured that "Masaloth" represents the cave-region only to be reached by steps (ni'silloth) on the north side of the Wady-el-Humâm, near Irbil (Arbela), which was anciently used as a sort of fortress, and which in the time of Herod stood a long siege (Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' i. 16, § 4). See Stanley's 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 324, note [2]. Certainly the campaign described in this verse, which must have belonged to the close of the 151st year, appears to have been quite distinct from that of the 152nd year, which was in the vicinity of Jerusalem.

in Arbela.] Arbela is usually spoken of as a village, or town; but here the name must designate a tract. (Compare the double use of the word "Samaria.") The tract would seem to be that immediately south of the Wady-el-Humâm, on the west coast of the Sea of Galilee, where the name Arbela still lingers in the modern "Irbid" or "Irbil."

B. C. 160. dred fifty and second year they encamped before Jerusalem:

4 From whence they removed, and went to ‖ Berea, with twenty thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen.

‖ Or, Berretho, Joseph.

5 Now Judas had pitched his tents at Eleasa, and three thousand chosen men with him:

6 Who seeing the multitude of the other army to be so great were sore afraid; whereupon many conveyed themselves out of the host, insomuch as there abode of them no more but eight hundred men.

7 When Judas therefore saw that his host slipt away, and that the battle pressed upon him, he was sore troubled in mind, and much distressed, for that he had no time to gather them together. B. C. 160

8 Nevertheless unto them that remained he said, Let us arise and go up against our enemies, if peradventure we may be able to fight with them.

9 But they dehorted him, saying, We shall never be able: ‖ let us now rather save our lives, and hereafter we will return with our brethren, and fight against them: for we are but few.

‖ We follow here the Roman Copy.

3. the first month of the hundred fifty and second year.] The 152nd year of the Seleucidæ began in October B.C. 161, according to Clinton. The "first month" is, however, in all probability, the first month of the Jews —April B.C. 160.

they encamped before Jerusalem.] Without, it would seem, encountering any resistance. Ewald supposes that the Jews were surprised as they were keeping the Passover ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 323); but Grimm points out that chronological considerations (see ch. vii. 49) make it impossible that the appearance before Jerusalem can have taken place until the later part of the month Nisan, when the Passover would have been completed some weeks. Judas seems certainly to have been taken off his guard. Perhaps he supposed that the defeat and death of Nicanor had secured for Israel a time of quiet.

4. From whence they removed, and went to Berea.] Beræa is probably the modern Bireh, which is the ancient Beeroth, situated about ten miles north of Jerusalem on the road to Samaria. The removal of Bacchides, from the near vicinity of Jerusalem to a place ten miles distant, must have been the result of intelligence that Judas was collecting a relieving army, which might threaten the communications of the Syrians, and place them between two dangers. Bacchides must have felt it necessary to deal with Judas first.

with twenty thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen.] A moderate number, compared with others previously mentioned (ch. iii. 39; iv. 28; vi. 30). It may well be accepted as authentic.

5. Judas had pitched . . . at Eleasa.] A site called "Ilasa" has been found in the near vicinity of Bir-ez-Zeit: and this is now thought to be "Eleasa." (See the 'Quarterly Statement' of the Palestine Exploration Fund for Jan. 1881, p. 45.) It commands "the narrow pass through which the road from Samaria to Jerusalem leads in the vicinity of Ain-el-Haramiyeh."

three thousand chosen men with him.] The same number as at Adasa (ch. vii. 40) against Nicanor—perhaps as many as the nature of the ground permitted—certainly not as many as he was able to collect in the time (Ewald), since they were "picked men"—i.e. carefully selected out of a greater number.

6. Who seeing the multitude . . . were sore afraid.] It is not clear why this was so, since the soldiers of Judas were accustomed to contend against greater odds than were now arrayed against them. Perhaps the presence of Alcimus with the enemy exercised a paralysing influence—perhaps they experienced one of those unreasonable panics to which all troops are from time to time subject. Had the 3000 firmly stood their ground, there is no reason why the same successful result should not have been achieved at Eleasa as at Adasa.

7. his host slipt away.] Little by little his soldiers drew off, dispersed themselves, and retired to their homes. Had Judas acted with his usual promptness, this would scarcely have occurred.

the battle pressed upon him.] The enemy, that is, allowed him no respite, but sought by all means to force on a general engagement.

8. Let us arise and go up.] Here the old spirit of the hero shews itself. (Compare ch. iii. 16–23; iv. 8–12, 29–34, &c.) It was his general system to take the offensive, however small his forces might be.

9. they dehorted him.] Not for the first time. Compare ch. iii. 17.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 160.

10 Then Judas said, God forbid that I should do this thing, and flee away from them: if our time be come, let us die manfully for our brethren, and ‖let us not stain our honour.

‖ Gr. let us not leave any just cause behind us, why our glory should be spoken against.

11 With that the host of Bacchides removed out of their tents, and stood over against ‖them, their horsemen being divided into two troops, and their slingers and archers going before the host, and they that marched in the foreward were all mighty men.

‖ Or, the Jews.

12 As for Bacchides, he was in the right wing: so the host drew near on the two parts, and sounded their trumpets.

B. C. 160.

13 They also of Judas' side, even they sounded their trumpets also, so that the earth shook at the noise of the armies, and the battle continued from morning till night.

14 Now when Judas perceived that Bacchides and the strength of his army were on the right side, he took with him all the hardy men, 15 Who discomfited the right wing, and pursued them unto the mount Azotus.

16 But when they of the left

10. if our time be come, let us die manfully.] Judas, it would seem, had a presentiment of his defeat and death. Never before had he been deserted by his troops; never, probably, before had he fought at the head of so small a company. Eight hundred to twenty-two thousand was a disproportion of numbers against which even his valour and strategic skill could not hope to obtain success. So, like Leonidas at Thermopylæ, he made up his mind to die.

let us not stain our honour.] Compare ch. ii. 51, 64; iii. 3, 9; v. 57, &c.

11. the host of Bacchides removed out of their tents.] Rather, "the host of Judas." (So Grimm.) At the stirring words of Judas, his host marched forth; whereupon "they," i.e. the Syrians, went out to meet them: with their horse (v. 4) divided, as was usual, into two bodies, and placed no doubt at the extremity of either wing. The light-armed, archers and slingers, marched first, like the Roman hastati; behind them came the πρωταγωνισταί, the strength of the army, like the Roman principes. (See Liv. viii. 8.)

all mighty men.] Rather, "all the mighty men." All the best soldiers were massed together, and fought in the front rank of the phalanx, immediately behind the light-armed.

12. Bacchides . . . was in the right wing.] An Oriental leader usually placed himself in the centre of his army (Herod. vii. 121; Xen. 'Anab.' i. 3, § 6, 12; Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.' iii. 11); but a Greek frequently preferred to command one wing. Alexander the Great led the right wing in each of his three battles against the Persians (Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.' i. 14, § 10; ii. 9; iii. 12).

the host drew near.] Literally, "the phalanx," i.e. the main army of the Syrians, advanced against the enemy.

on the two parts.] Rather, "with both divisions." The Syrian army is regarded as formed of two divisions, a right wing and a left, without any centre. Both wings advanced simultaneously to the attack.

13. the earth shook.] A common hyperbole. (See 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Ezek. xxvi. 10, 15; xxvii. 28, &c.) The concussion of the air causes men to feel as if the earth were trembling beneath them.

the battle continued from morning till night.] This is a tangible and very important fact. Judas with his "little band" of eight hundred men was able to make head against the entire host of Syria, to resist and continue the combat during the whole day, "until night," or rather, "until evening." So prolonged a resistance of a mere handful of men to overwhelming numbers, in a position of no very great strength, is scarcely on record.

14. when Judas perceived, &c.] This incident is even more extraordinary than the prolonged resistance. There is, however, no reason for doubting it. After a combat of hours, which must have seriously diminished the number of his troops, Judas concentrated his efforts on the attack of the enemy's right wing, where Bacchides was, and actually succeeded, "discomfited" it, and drove it from the field in headlong flight to a neighbouring mountain.

all the hardy men.] Rather, "the valiant men"—those who were most courageous.

15. mount Azotus.] The reading is uncertain. Some MSS. have "Azara," while Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' x. 11, § 6) has "Aza." The mountain near Bir-ez-Zeit, to which the name Atâra now attaches, seems to be intended (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. ii. p. 264).

16. when they of the left wing saw, &c.] The Syrian left wing, sweeping before it the

B. C. 160. wing saw that they of the right wing were discomfited, they followed upon Judas and those that were with him hard at the heels from behind:

17 Whereupon there was a sore battle, insomuch as many were slain on both parts.

18 Judas also was killed, and the remnant fled.

19 Then Jonathan and Simon took Judas their brother, and buried him in the sepulchre of his fathers in Modin.

20 Moreover they bewailed him, [a] and all Israel made great lamentation for him, and mourned many days, B. C. 160. saying,

[a] ch. 13. 26.

21 How is the valiant man fallen, that delivered Israel!

22 As for the other things concerning Judas and his wars, and the noble acts which he did, and his greatness, they are not written: for they were very many.

23 ¶ Now after the death of Judas the wicked began to put forth their heads in all the coasts of Israel, and there arose up all such as wrought iniquity.

few men whom Judas had not taken with him to make his attack, wheeled round in the rear of the Israelites, and fell on them from behind while they were still engaged with the right wing in front. The result was that they were crushed between the two masses.

18. the remnant fled.] Very few indeed can have escaped, and they, probably, only under cover of the darkness, which by this time must have set in. (See v. 13.)

19. Jonathan and Simon took Judas.] Apparently they had been in the fight, and seeing their brother fall they gave up resistance, contenting themselves with carrying off his body to Modeïn, which lay at no great distance from the battle-field. On the sepulchre of the Maccabee family at Modeïn, see ch. xiii. 25–30, and the comment ad loc.

20. all Israel made great lamentation for him.] Compare 2 Chr. xxxv. 24, and infra, ch. xiii. 26. Great public lamentations for their dead kings were not very usual among the Jews. They seem to have been reserved for such as were slain by a public enemy.

and mourned many days.] The mourning for Jacob lasted seventy days (Gen. l. 3), that for Aaron (Num. xx. 29) and for Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 8) thirty. Thirty days are also mentioned as the period for a solemn mourning by Josephus ('Bell. Jud.' iii. 9, § 5).

21. How is the valiant man fallen.] Compare the refrain in David's lament for Saul and Jonathan—"How are the mighty fallen!" (2 Sam. i. 19, 25, 27.)

that delivered Israel.] Rather, "that was wont to deliver Israel." The present participle has a frequentative force.

22. the other things concerning Judas.] Or "the rest of the acts of Judas." Compare 1 Kings xi. 41; xiv. 29; xv. 23, &c. The author has evidently these and similar passages in his mind; but, instead of referring us to other sources of information for the remainder of Judas' acts, as do the writers of Kings and Chronicles for those of their heroes, he simply declares, that they have not been written (by himself), since they were (too) many. He gives us no indication of acquaintance with any other historian who had written concerning Judas.

§ 2. Interregnum and Appointment of Jonathan to be Governor.

23–30. The sudden death of Judas had left the patriotic party without a head. Three sons of Mattathias still survived: John, the eldest, who was comparatively speaking undistinguished; Simon, the second, whom his father had recommended to be his brethren's counsellor (ch. ii. 65); and Jonathan, the youngest, whom Judas had made his special companion in war (ch. v. 17, 24). No one of these could assert any clear right of precedence over the others, and it would seem that no one of them preferred any claim at all. The leadership was the post of danger, and the post of danger was perhaps not coveted by any. Thus the death of Judas was followed by an interregnum, during which the patriots suffered grievously (vv. 23–27). The scourge of famine was added to the horrors of persecution; and the affliction was such as seemed almost unparalleled (v. 27). Under these circumstances the need of a leader became palpable, and the chief friends and counsellors of Judas assembled together to select one. Jonathan, though the youngest, was chosen, as the greatest captain, and, unanimously as it would seem, appointed to succeed his brother (vv. 28–30).

23. the wicked began to put forth their heads.] "The wicked" are, not the heathen, but the idolatrous Jews, whom Judas had kept in check (ch. vii. 24, 25). They began now to raise their heads and "peep forth," which is the exact meaning of ἐκκύπτω.

all such as wrought iniquity.] These are

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 160. 24 In those days also was there a very great famine, by reason whereof the country revolted, and went with ‖ them.

‖ Bacchides and his company.

25 Then Bacchides chose the wicked men, and made them lords of the country.

26 And they made enquiry and search for Judas' friends, and brought them unto Bacchides, who took vengeance of them, and ‖ used them despitefully.

‖ Gr. mocked them.

27 So was there a great affliction in Israel, the like whereof was not [b] since the time that a prophet was not seen among them.

[b] ch. 4. 46.

28 For this cause all Judas' friends came together, and said unto Jonathan, 29 Since thy brother Judas died, we have no man like him to go forth against our enemies, and Bacchides, and against them of our nation that are adversaries to us. B. C. 160.

30 Now therefore we have chosen thee this day to be our prince and captain in his stead, that thou mayest fight our battles.

31 Upon this Jonathan took the governance upon him at that time, and rose up instead of his brother Judas.

32 But when Bacchides gat knowledge thereof, he sought for to slay him.

33 Then Jonathan, and Simon his brother, and all that were with him, perceiving that, fled into the wilder-the same persons. The second clause repeats and intensifies the first, but adds no new fact.

24. was there a very great famine.] On the liability of Palestine to famine, see Gen. xii. 10, xlii. 5, xlvii. 13; Ruth i. 1; 2 Sam. xxi. 1, &c. If the spring rains fail, there is no possibility of a crop; irrigation, except in the valley of the Jordan, being impracticable.

the country revolted, and went with them.] Ewald takes this to mean, that "the land itself deserted the holy cause, and was as false and faithless as its children ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 324); but it may be doubted whether the prosaic paraphrase of Josephus—"so that many through lack of provisions deserted to the Syro-Macedonians"—does not better express the writer's meaning. By "the country" he intends "its inhabitants."

25. Bacchides chose the wicked men.] Bacchides put idolatrous Jews in positions of authority all over the country.

26. Judas' friends.] "The early friends of Judas were," as Ewald says, "sought out, betrayed, mocked, and punished." Ἐνέπαιζεν is "mocked," rather than "used despitefully."

27. since the time that a prophet was not seen.] Malachi was regarded as "the last of the Prophets." His date is not altogether certain; but upon the whole it appears most probable that he was contemporary with Nehemiah during the later portion of his governorship (B.C. 431–430). The expression used would thus mean, "for the last 270 years."

30. to be our prince and captain.] Rather, "our ruler and captain." Jonathan, like Judas (ch. ii. 66), is called ἄρχων, "ruler;" Simon is the first who bears the formal title of ἐθνάρχης, "prince" (ch. xv. 1, 2).

§ 3. War of Jonathan with Bacchides—He avenges the Death of his Brother John, and defeats the Syrians at the Jordan.

31–49. The news of Jonathan's appointment moved Bacchides to fresh efforts. He had slain Judas: could he slay the remaining sons of Mattathias, he hoped that the insurrection would come to an end. He therefore once more took the field. Jonathan retreated before him into "the wilderness of Thecoë," or the wild district south-east of Jerusalem, towards the Dead Sea. Here, encumbered with baggage and non-combatants, he sent these under the conduct of his brother John to be cared for by his friends (ch. v. 25), the Nabathæans, in their remote country near Petra. The line of their march is not clear; but it appears that they were attacked on their way by a tribe of roving Arabs, called the Beni Jambri, who killed John, and took the convoy. Jonathan, to revenge his brother's slaughter, crossed the Jordan into the Beni Jambri territory, surprised a wedding party by an ambush, and was returning laden with booty, when he found his retreat cut off by Bacchides on the left bank of the river. Forced to risk an engagement, he was so far successful as to inflict on Bacchides the loss of a thousand men, and to make good the return of his own men to the right bank by means of their swimming the river.

31. Jonathan . . . rose up instead of his brother Judas.] Compare ch. iii. 1, where the same expression occurs.

B. C. 160. ness of Thecoe, and pitched their tents by the water of the pool Asphar.

‖ Or, When Bacchides understood, on the sabbath day he came near.

34 ‖ Which when Bacchides understood, he came near to Jordan with all his host upon the sabbath day.

‖ Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 1.

35 Now Jonathan had sent his brother ‖ John, a captain of the people, to pray his friends the Nabathites, ‖ that they might leave with them their carriage, which was much. B. C. 160.

36 But the children of ‖ Jambri came out of Medaba, and took John, and all that he had, and went their way with it. ‖ Gr. Ambri.

37 After this came word to Jonathan and Simon his brother, that the children of Jambri made a great marriage, and were bringing the bride from ‖ Nadabatha with a great ‖ Gr. that he might leave with them their carriage, or, stuff.

‖ Or, Medaba.

33. the wilderness of Thecoe.] Thecoë is the same as "Tekoah" or "Tekoa" (2 Sam. xiv. 2, xxiii. 26; Neh. iii. 5, 27, &c.). It was a small town in Southern Judæa, six miles south of Bethlehem. The site is reasonably identified with the modern Teku'a. "The wilderness of Thecoë" is the broad tract of high ground lying east and south-east of the city, which is at first a table-land, but breaks up into rugged and desolate mountains as it descends to the level of the Dead Sea (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. i. p. 486). Compare 2 Chr. xx. 20.

the pool Asphar.] Λάκκος is not a natural pool, but a "cistern" or "reservoir." It is probable that there were many such in the Judæan hill-country, besides the well-known ones near Jerusalem. The rain-water was stored in them. No other author mentions the λάκκος Ἀσφάρ.

34. This verse appears to be an anticipation of v. 43. The author was about to hasten from the account of Jonathan's encampment at "the pool Asphar" to his engagement east of the Jordan with Bacchides; but, on second thoughts, perceived that his narrative would scarcely be intelligible unless he explained the circumstances which had brought Jonathan to that locality. He therefore interposed at this point the narrative of John's death and the vengeance taken for it (vv. 35–42), which is a sort of long parenthesis.

near to Jordan.] This is a mistranslation —πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου can mean nothing but "across the Jordan."

35. a captain of the people.] Rather, "in command of the camp-followers," which is a common meaning of ὄχλος (Xen. 'Anab.' iii. 4, § 26; iv. 3, § 26, &c.).

his friends the Nabathites.] Compare above, ch. v. 25, and see the comment ad loc.

their carriage.] Literally, "their baggage." No doubt the wish was to deposit with the Nabathæans all the impedimenta — women, children, camp-followers, baggage, &c. "Carriage" may stand, if it be taken in the sense of all that the army carried with it.

36. the children of Jambri.] A tribe not otherwise known—unless we suppose the Amorites to be meant. Josephus has οἱ Ἀμαραίου παῖδες ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 1, § 2), and several MSS. read Ἀμβρί or Ἀμβροί for Ἰαμβρί. At an early date the Amorites certainly held portions of the Moabite country (Num. xxi. 31); and they may never have been wholly dispossessed.

Medaba.] "Medaba" appears as a Moabite town as early as the time of Moses (Num. xxi. 30). On the Moabite Stone it is said to have been taken by the Israelites under Omri, and held for forty years, after which the Moabites recovered it ('Records of the Past,' vol. xi. p. 166). Isaiah mentions it among the towns of Moab (Is. xv. 2). The place retains its name almost unchanged, and has been visited by many modern travellers. It is in the Belka, or down county, of Moab, about four miles S.E. of Heshbon.

took John.] It appears, by v. 42, that John was not made prisoner, but slain. Perhaps he fell into the hands of the enemy when mortally wounded.

all that he had.] All the persons, and all the baggage, that he was conveying into the Nabathæan country.

37. from Nadabatha.] "Nadabatha" (Ναδαβάθ) is known to us only from this passage. It was probably a small town, or village, in the Moabite country, or at any rate in the region east of Jordan. Josephus has "Gabatha" ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 1. § 4)—a name equally obscure.

with a great train.] The custom of escorting a bride from her own home to the bridegroom's house, is one practised commonly in the East, and often involves the passage of "a great train." The bridegroom is accompanied by a larger or smaller number of his intimate friends (Judg. xiv. 11), and frequently by a band of musicians (Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9). The bride has her own atten-

B. C. 160. train, as being the daughter of one of the great princes of Chanaan.

38 Therefore they remembered John their brother, and went up, and hid themselves under the covert of the mountain:

39 Where they lifted up their eyes, and looked, and, behold, there was much ado and great carriage: and the bridegroom came forth, and his friends and brethren, to meet them with ‖drums, and ‖instruments of musick, and many weapons.

‖ Or, timbrels.
‖ Or, musicians.

40 Then Jonathan and they that were with him rose up against them from the place where they lay in ambush, and made a slaughter of them in such sort, as many fell down dead, and the remnant fled into the mountain, and they took all their spoils. B. C. 160.

41 Thus was the marriage turned into mourning, and the noise of their melody into lamentation.

42 So when they had avenged fully the blood of their brother, they turned again to the marsh of Jordan.

43 Now when Bacchides heard hereof, he came on the sabbath day unto the banks of Jordan with a great power.

44 Then Jonathan said to his company, Let us go up now and fight for our lives, for it standeth not with us to day, as in time past:

45 For, behold, the battle is be-dants; and when the two parties unite, the entire procession is sometimes very numerous. The more wealthy and important the families to which the bride and bridegroom belong, the larger the accompanying train. In the present instance, both families were evidently of high rank, the bride especially, who was "the daughter of one of the great princes of Chanaan."

Chanaan.] The term is large enough to cover the Moabites (Judith v. 3), to whom the bride's family probably belonged. By "great princes" we must understand leading men in the city to which the bride belonged.

38. hid themselves under the covert of the mountain.] The mountain region east of Jordan is in many places richly clothed with wood, and is very suitable for ambuscades. "The traveller," says Canon Tristram, "rides up and down deep concealed glens; sometimes by a track meandering along the banks of a brook, with a dense fringe of oleanders. . . . Lovely knolls and dells open out at every turn, gently rising to the wooded plateau above. Then we rise to higher ground, and ride through noble forests of oak" ('Bible Places,' p. 322).

39. there was much ado and great carriage.] Rather, "much noise and great convoy of baggage." to meet them.] I.e. to meet the bride and her attendants.

with drums.] Drums, shaped like a kettle-drum, were in use among the Syrians and other Oriental nations, and were much employed in religious orgies of a wild and enthusiastic character, such as those of Bacchus and Cybele. It is possible that they may have been also used on such an occasion as the bringing home of a bride. Or the word translated "drums" may here mean "tambourines," which would almost certainly have been among the "instruments of music" employed.

many weapons.] The Easterns always go armed, and would think it especially necessary to carry arms when they were about to serve as escort for a bride. Ὅπλα will include both defensive and offensive arms, but scarcely "torches," as Grimm supposes.

40. fell down dead.] Literally, "fell wounded." Compare ch. iii. 11. Josephus says that the number of the slain was 400 ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 1, § 4).

42. the marsh of Jordan.] "Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest" (Josh. iii. 15); and this overflow leaves a marshy tract on either side of the river for several weeks, more especially in the lower part of its course, near its entrance into the Dead Sea (Lynch, 'Expedition to Jordan and Dead Sea,' p. 171; Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. ii. p. 502). Jonathan had to encamp in this marshy district.

43. Bacchides . . . came . . . unto the banks of Jordan.] Bacchides, who had already crossed the river (v. 34)—probably by a ford higher up—interposed his army between the Jordan and the place where Jonathan was encamped, thus cutting off his retreat.

on the sabbath day.] Under the notion, apparently, that the Jews would not fight on the sabbath (ch. ii. 32–38), or at any rate would not interfere with his troops taking up their position.

45. the battle is before us and behind us.]

B. C. 160. fore us and behind us, and the water of Jordan on this side and that side, the marsh likewise and wood, neither is there place for us to turn aside.

46 Wherefore cry ye now unto heaven, that ye may be delivered from the hand of your enemies.

47 With that they joined battle, and Jonathan stretched forth his hand to smite Bacchides, but he turned back from him.

48 Then Jonathan and they that were with him leapt into Jordan, and B. C. 160. swam over unto the farther bank: howbeit the other passed not over Jordan unto them.

49 So there were slain of Bacchides' side that day about ‖a thousand men.

‖ two thousand men, Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 1.

50 Afterward returned Bacchides to Jerusalem, and ‖repaired the strong cities in Judea; the fort in Jericho, and Emmaus, and Bethhoron, and Bethel, and Thamnatha, ‖ Or, built.

The Syrians were in front, the Beni Jambri, burning for revenge, behind. The Jordan barred their progress both to the right and left, if they should attempt to avoid the host of Bacchides by making a circuit. In their rear lay marsh and jungle. The situation might well have seemed almost desperate.

46. cry ye now unto heaven.] Compare ch. iii. 18, 50; iv. 10. The author avoids, as usual, the introduction of the name of God.

47. he turned back from him.] Bacchides did not altogether decline an engagement. It would have been scarcely possible for him to do so, with the river directly at his back. But after a resistance in which he lost a thousand men (v. 49), he drew off his forces, probably towards the north, and left the passage of the river clear. Jonathan immediately took advantage of the movement, and with his men swam the river. None of the Syrian host attempted to follow.

§ 4. Bacchides establishes Garrisons in all the chief Towns of Judæa, and takes the Sons of the chief Men as Hostages — Attempt of Alcimus to dismantle the Temple, and his Death — Bacchides returns to Antioch.

50–57. Despite the slight success obtained by Jonathan over Bacchides at the Jordan, the fortunes of the insurrection were now at their lowest ebb. Bacchides was master of Jerusalem, and of all the more important of the Jewish cities. Alcimus, his creature, lorded it in the Temple. For the better repression of patriotic effort, the Syrian garrisons were spread over the land. All men of note, suspected of disaffection, were compelled to give their sons as hostages for their good behaviour. Alcimus, the Hellenizing High Priest, began alterations in the Temple, which were probably intended to weaken it as a fortress, and perhaps to assimilate it to the Grecian model. The patriots made no head; they were weak and scattered; they appeared to have almost ceased to exist; and when, upon the death of Alcimus, tranquillity continued undisturbed, Bacchides, regarding the insurrection as put down, returned to Antioch, and left Judæa to itself for two years.

50. the fort in Jericho.] Jericho, one of the chief strongholds of the Canaanites, was a place of little importance under the independent Jewish monarchy, but rose to eminence after the return from the Captivity, and became a favourite residence of Herod the Great. When Pompey took it, two forts, called "Threx" and "Taurus," commanded its approaches (Strab. xvi. 2, § 40). Whether it was one of these that Bacchides now built is uncertain.

Emmaus.] This is probably the place mentioned in ch. iii. 40, which afterwards became Nicopolis, and is now 'Amwâs, about 20 miles west by north of Jerusalem.

Bethhoron.] On the site of Beth-horon, see the comment on ch. iii. 16.

Bethel.] Bethel, the southern seat of the idolatrous calf-worship instituted by Jeroboam, was attached to the kingdom of Judah by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 15) and re-occupied by some of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 28), continuing thenceforth to be recognised as a Jewish city (Neh. xi. 31). It was, however, of small importance, and obtains no mention in the later Jewish history, except in the present passage.

Thamnatha, Pharathoni.] No comma should separate these words. The "Thamnatha" here mentioned is distinguished from other cities of the same name by the epithet of "Pharathoni." There was a Timnath-heres (Judg. ii. 9) or Timnath-serah (Josh. xix. 50) in Mount Ephraim, where Joshua was buried (ib. xxiv. 30), and a Timnathah in the Philistine country, from which Samson took his wife (Judg. xiv. 1–5). The latter is mentioned, under the form of Tamna, in Sennacherib's inscriptions. Timnatha-Pharathoni was probably distinct from both.

B. C. cir. 161. Pharathoni, and ‖Taphon, these did he strengthen with high walls, with gates, and with bars.

‖ Joseph. Tecoa.

51 And in them he set a garrison, that they might work malice upon Israel.

‖ Gr. the city in Bethsura.

52 He fortified also ‖the city Bethsura, and Gazara, and the tower, and put forces in them, and provision of victuals.

53 Besides, he took the chief men's sons in the country for hostages, and put them into the tower at Jerusalem to be kept.

B. C. 159. 54 Moreover in the hundred fifty and third year, in the second month, Alcimus commanded that the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary should be pulled down; he pulled down also the works of the prophets. B. C. 159.

55 And as he began to pull down, even at that time was Alcimus plagued, and his enterprizes hindered: for his mouth was stopped, and he was taken with a palsy, so that he could no more speak any thing, nor give order concerning his house.

56 So Alcimus died at that time with great torment.

57 Now when Bacchides saw that Alcimus was dead, he returned to the king: whereupon [c]the land of Judea was in rest two years. [c] ch. 7. 50.

Taphon.] Rather, "Tepho"—probably identical with the "Beth-Tappuah" of Josh. xv. 53, near Hebron, which is now "Teffeh" (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. ii. p. 70).

51. in them.] I.e. "in each of them."

work malice upon Israel.] Literally, "be at enmity with Israel."

52. Bethsura and Gazara.] On "Bethsura," see above, ch. iv. 61, and compare ch. vi. 26, 31, 50; on Gazara, or Gazera, see ch. iv. 15, and the comment ad loc.

the tower.] The Syro-Macedonian fortress in the city of Jerusalem (ch. i. 33–36; iii. 45; iv. 41; vi. 18–24, 61).

53. he took the chief men's sons . . . for hostages.] A new stroke of policy, and one likely to prove very effective. It had long been employed by the Romans (supra, ch. viii. 7).

54. in the hundred fifty and third year.] B.C. 160–159. The "second month" is probably the Jewish second month, Zif or Iyar, corresponding mainly with our May, and, as the Syro-Macedonian year began in October, would be May B.C. 159.

Alcimus commanded that the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary should be pulled down.] The inner court of the sanctuary was that accessible to the Priests and Levites only. Its destruction would tend to obliterate the difference between clergy and laity, thus assimilating the Jews to their Grecian neighbours, among whom there was no such thing as a priest caste. At the same time, its destruction would tend to weaken the defences of the Temple, since each enclosing wall might be defended separately, and a besieged force would retreat from one court to another. The Temple, though in a certain sense under Alcimus, who was now generally accepted as High Priest, seems to have been still viewed as probably, in the last resort, the fortress to which the patriots would gather, and where they would resist to the uttermost.

he pulled down also the works of the prophets.] What these were is uncertain. The second Temple had been built by Zerubbabel under the guidance and encouragement of Zechariah and Haggai (Ezra v. 1; vi. 14; Hag. i. 1, 12–14; Zech. iv. 6–10, &c.); but it is not clear that they had had any part in the arrangement of the plan of the building. Still, it may well be, that, at the distance of above 350 years, some special parts of the edifice were ascribed to them.

55. And as he began to pull down, even at that time was Alcimus plagued.] The writer undoubtedly regards the death of Alcimus as God's judgment upon him for his impiety in meddling with the time-honoured arrangements of the Temple building. He seems to have had a stroke of paralysis (ἐπλήγη) exactly at the time when the workmen commenced to carry out his alterations. His illness caused a stoppage of the works.

his mouth was stopped.] Some obstruction of the power of speech is a common feature of paralysis. The affliction of Alcimus was such that he could not even leave directions concerning his household affairs.

56. Alcimus died . . . with great torment.] He died—as we should now express it—after severe sufferings.

57. when Bacchides saw that Alcimus was dead, he returned to the king.] It is probable that Alcimus, like other renegades, had been more bitter against those who kept to the old faith, than the party to which he had

B. C. cir. 157.

58 Then all the ungodly men held a council, saying, Behold, Jonathan and his company are at ease, and dwell without care: now therefore we will bring Bacchides hither, who shall take them all in one night.

59 So they went and consulted with him.

60 Then removed he, and came with a great host, and sent letters privily to his adherents in Judea, that they should take Jonathan and those that were with him: howbeit they could not, because their counsel was known unto them.

B. C. cir. 157.

61 Wherefore they took of the men of the country, that were authors of that mischief, about fifty persons, and slew them.

62 Afterward Jonathan, and Simon, and they that were with him, got them away to Bethbasi, which is joined himself. He had, it would seem, stimulated the lukewarm zeal of Bacchides, and held him to the work of persecution. No sooner, therefore, was Alcimus dead, than the Syrian chief changed his policy, left the religious Jews in peace, and returned to Antioch. The result was a respite from suffering. "The land of Judæa was in rest two years."

§ 5. Last Efforts of Bacchides and their Failure—Peace made between Bacchides and Jonathan—Jonathan rules Judæa from Michmash.

58–73. In Judæa, left to itself, the patriotic party speedily revived, and obtained the upper hand. "Jonathan and his company were at ease and dwelt without care" (v. 58). All that they needed was to be let alone, and the nation would be sure to rally to them. But, in the space of two years (v. 57), this became fully evident to the opposite party, who saw that without external aid they were lost. Once more, therefore, they had recourse to Bacchides, and induced him, in B.C. 158–7, to make a fresh invasion, under promise that they would deliver Jonathan into his hands. But they were unable to redeem their pledge, and Bacchides, enraged at his failure, put fifty of them to death (v. 61). Still, he did not desist, but made a further attack, probably in B.C. 157–6, when he besieged the stronghold of Beth-basi, which the patriots had made their headquarters. Defeated here by a combined movement, skilfully executed by Jonathan and Simon (vv. 65–68), he again vented his wrath on his supporters, by fresh executions (v. 69); and determined to give up the struggle. Though Bacchides alone is mentioned, we must suppose Demetrius cognizant of all, and a party to the change of policy. It is a reasonable conjecture that Roman influence was the main factor in producing the change, and that the agreement between Jonathan and Bacchides (vv. 70–72) was the direct consequence of the treaty made by Judas with Rome (ch. viii. 17–30), and of the message sent to Demetrius, warning him against interference with Rome's allies (ibid. 31, 32). The new policy was probably inaugurated about B.C. 156, and for four years Jonathan governed Israel quietly from the ancient city at Michmash.

58. the ungodly men.] I.e. the Hellenizing party. (See ch. ii. 44; iii. 5, 8, &c.)

Jonathan and his company are at ease, and dwell without care.] Literally, "dwell at ease and are trustful." They had confidence in the good faith of Bacchides, and were, therefore, quite easy in their minds, expecting nothing hostile.

who shall take them all in one night.] Apparently the design was to bring Bacchides with an army into the country secretly, and to make a night attack on Jonathan and his friends, whom it was expected to surprise and capture.

60. Then removed he, and came.] Rather, "Then removed he, to come." The intention, not its execution, is stated.

and sent letters.] On starting from Antioch, Bacchides wrote to his partisans in Judæa, throwing on them the duty of seizing Jonathan and his friends, which they had assigned to him (v. 58). This duty they were unable to execute, since their designs had got wind, and Jonathan was upon his guard.

their counsel was known unto them.] I.e. the counsel of the Hellenizers was known to Jonathan and his friends.

61. they took.] A new subject is to be supplied by the common sense of the reader, viz. "the Syrians." The Syrians, disappointed at the failure of an enterprise, which had been represented as so easy, took vengeance on those who had deluded them by putting fifty of them to death. So Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 1, § 5). Grimm, however, and Ewald suppose that the executions were the work of Jonathan.

62. Bethbasi.] This is a wholly unknown site, and receives no light from the alternative reading of "Beth-alaga" in Josephus (l. s. c.).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 156.

in the wilderness, and they repaired the decays thereof, and made it strong.

63 Which thing when Bacchides knew, he gathered together all his host, and sent word ‖ to them that were of Judea.

‖ Or, to such of the country as were his friends to take his part.

64 Then went he and laid siege against Bethbasi; and they fought against it a long season, and made engines of war.

65 But Jonathan left his brother Simon in the city, and went forth himself into the country, and with a certain number went he forth.

‖ Or, Odomarra.

66 And he smote ‖ Odonarkes and his brethren, and the children of Phasiron in their tent.

67 And when he began to smite them, and came up with his forces, Simon and his company went out of the city, and burned up the engines of war, 68 And fought against Bacchides, who was discomfited by them, and they afflicted him sore: for his counsel and travail was in vain.

69 Wherefore he was very wroth at the wicked men that gave him counsel to come into the country, insomuch as he slew many of them, and purposed to return into his own country.

B. C. cir. 156.

70 Whereof when Jonathan had knowledge, he sent ambassadors unto him, to the end he should make peace with him, and deliver them the prisoners.

71 Which thing he accepted, and did according to his demands, and sware unto him that he would never do him harm all the days of his life.

72 When therefore he had restored unto him the prisoners that he had taken aforetime out of the land of Judea, he returned and went his way into his own land, neither ‖ came he any more into their borders.

‖ Gr. added he to come any more.

73 Thus the sword ceased from Israel: but Jonathan dwelt at Machmas, and began to ‖ govern the people; and he destroyed the ungodly men out of Israel.

‖ Gr. judge.

The place was probably in some part of "the wilderness of Tekoa" (v. 33). It had been fortified, but had fallen into decay.

63. all his host.] I.e. the "great host" of v. 60, which he had brought with him from Antioch.

sent word to them that were of Judea.] To his partisans among the Jews — the Hellenizers.

64. and made engines of war.] Bacchides had not expected a severe struggle, and had, therefore, not brought with him a siege train. He was consequently compelled to set to work and make his own military engines. This delay afforded an opportunity to Jonathan.

65. Jonathan left his brother Simon, &c.] Jonathan divided his forces. Leaving Simon in the city under the protection of walls, he took the post of danger, and "went out," with the object of collecting a relieving army and so saving the place. The operation was completely successful (vv. 66–68).

with a certain number.] Rather, "with a small number." Compare Is. x. 19; Eccles. xvii. 2.

66. he smote Odonarkes.] The MSS. have either "Odoarrhes" or "Odomera." Neither form of the name is otherwise known; nor can it be determined whether an independent chief, or an officer in the service of Bacchides, is intended.

children of Phasiron.] One of the many desert tribes that are not otherwise known to us.

69. he slew many of them.] Compare v. 61, and for the readiness of Bacchides to massacre men in cold blood, see ch. vii. 19, 24; ch. ix. 26.

70. the prisoners.] I.e. those of the patriotic party whom he had previously arrested and held as prisoners. See vv. 26 and 72.

73. Jonathan dwelt at Machmas.] "Machmas" is undoubtedly the "Michmash" of 1 Sam. xiii. and xiv., where Saul and Jonathan defeated the Philistines. It lay about seven miles north of Jerusalem, in a very strong position, on the northern edge of the great Wady Suweinit. Sennacherib occupied it on his first expedition against Hezekiah (Is. x. 28); and it was among the places where the Jews re-established themselves on their return from the Captivity (Ezra ii. 27; Neh.

Digitized by

CHAPTER X.

B. C. cir. 152. 1 Demetrius maketh large offers to have peace with Jonathan. 25 His letters to the Jews. 47 Jonathan maketh peace with Alexander, 50 who killeth Demetrius, 58 and marrieth the daughter of Ptolemeus. 62 Jonathan is sent for by him, and much honoured, 75 and prevaileth against the forces of Demetrius the younger, 84 and burneth the temple of Dagon.

‖ Joseph. the son of Antiochus Epiphanes.

IN the hundred and sixtieth year Alexander, ‖the son of Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, went up and took Ptolemais: for the people had received him, by means whereof he reigned there. B. C. cir. 152.

2 Now when king Demetrius heard thereof, he gathered together an exceeding great host, and went forth against him to fight.

3 Moreover Demetrius sent letters unto Jonathan with loving words, so as he magnified him.

4 For said he, Let us first make vii. 31, xi. 31). The site is still known as "Mukhmas"—a small and poor village. Jonathan's choice of Michmash indicates a feeling of insecurity, and a desire to establish himself in a position where he could not be easily surprised or overpowered.

CHAPTER X.

§ 1. ALEXANDER BALAS SETS HIMSELF UP AS A RIVAL TO DEMETRIUS—BOTH PRINCES COURT THE FAVOUR OF THE JEWS, WHO DETERMINE TO SIDE WITH ALEXANDER.

1–47. Rome had never cordially forgiven Demetrius his escape from her custody and seizure of the Syrian crown without her permission. She had actually acknowledged him as king, but she was glad of any opportunity to do him an injury. In this spirit she had promised the Jews her protection (ch. viii. 22–32) about the year B.C. 160, and now in B.C. 153–2 she openly supported the pretensions of a Syrian, who assumed the name of Alexander, and claimed to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, to the Syro-Macedonian throne (Polyb. xxxiii. 16). Under her sanction he enrolled troops, allied himself with Attalus of Pergamus, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Ptolemy Philometor, and landing at Ptolemaïs, on the coast of Palestine, assumed the title of king. Demetrius had rendered himself odious to a large number of his subjects; he had become a habitual drinker, and was intoxicated during the greater part of each day (ibid. xxxiii. 14, § 1). Alexander's pretensions were consequently received with a considerable degree of favour; the Syrians were divided into two parties, and a civil war of some duration ensued. Under these circumstances, it was natural that both parties should desire the friendship of the Jews, and should endeavour to outbid each other in the offers which they made to Jonathan. The first offers of Demetrius are contained in vv. 3–6, those of Alexander in vv. 18–20, the second offers of Demetrius in vv. 25–45. These last were very tempting: but it was felt that no dependence could be placed upon the king's adherence to them, if he were successful. The Jews therefore threw in their lot with Alexander, and continued his firm adherents throughout the struggle (v. 47).

1. In the hundred and sixtieth year.] The 160th Seleucid year commenced in October, B.C. 153, and terminated in October B.C. 152. The seizure of Ptolemaïs is thought to have taken place in the first half of the latter year (Clinton, 'F. H.' vol. iii. p. 325).

Alexander, the son of Antiochus.] It was natural that the Jews should accept this view of the matter, which even the Roman Senate did not shrink from endorsing with their authority (Polyb. xxxiii. 16, § 9). But it is generally maintained by the classical writers, that there was in reality no such relationship between Alexander Balas and Epiphanes (Polyb. xxxiii. 16, § 10; Appian, 'Syriac.' § 67; Justin. xxxv. 1). Justin goes so far as to say that Balas was a man of low birth.

and took Ptolemais.] On the situation of Ptolemaïs, see the comment on ch. v. 22. It was at this time, next to Seleucia, the most important city on the Syrian coast.

the people had received him.] I.e. the people of Ptolemaïs.

2. Demetrius . . . went forth against him to fight.] Justin (l. s. c.) tells us that Demetrius shewed much courage and spirit in defending his crown. In the first battle which he fought with his antagonist he was successful; and it was only when the forces of Egypt, Cappadocia, and Pergamus were brought into the field against him that he succumbed. Nearly two years elapsed between the landing of Alexander at Ptolemaïs and the defeat and death of his adversary.

3. with loving words.] Literally, "with peaceful words."

so as he magnified him.] Rather, "so as to magnify him." That proposals of peace and alliance should have been made to him by the great Syrian king was for the honour of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 152. peace with him, before he join with Alexander against us:

5 Else he will remember all the evils that we have done against him, and against his brethren and his people.

6 Wherefore he gave him authority to gather together an host, and to provide weapons, that he might aid him in battle: he commanded also that the hostages that were in the tower should be delivered him.

7 Then came Jonathan to Jerusalem, and read the letters in the audience of all the people, and of them that were in the tower:

8 Who were sore afraid, when they heard that the king had given him authority to gather together an host.

9 Whereupon they of the tower delivered their hostages unto Jonathan, and he delivered them unto their parents.

10 This done, Jonathan settled himself in Jerusalem, and began to build and repair the city. B. C. cir. 152.

11 And he commanded the workmen to build the walls and the mount Sion round about with square stones for fortification; and they did so.

12 Then the strangers, that were in the fortresses which Bacchides had built, fled away;

13 Insomuch as every man left his place, and went into his own country.

14 Only at Bethsura certain of those that had forsaken the law and the commandments remained still: for it was their place of refuge.

15 Now when king Alexander had heard what promises Demetrius had sent unto Jonathan: when also it was told him of the battles and noble acts which he and his brethren had done, and of the pains that they had endured, Jonathan, and raised him in the opinion of his neighbours.

6. he gave him authority to gather together an host.] Even in seeking their alliance, Demetrius did not fail to maintain his sovereign rights as lord paramount over the Jews. His permission implied that they might not levy an army, or forge weapons, unless he gave them leave.

the hostages that were in the tower.] See above, ch. ix. 53.

7. Jonathan . . . read the letters.] Jonathan summoned an assembly of the people, and invited the Syrian authorities who held "the tower" to attend it. He then read aloud before them the letters which he had received from Demetrius. Their genuineness was at once admitted, and acted on. The hostages were given up.

9. their hostages.] Rather, "the hostages."

10. Jonathan settled himself in Jerusalem.] I.e. removed from Michmash, and made Jerusalem the seat of his government.

began to build and repair the city.] Instead of collecting troops and forging arms, as Demetrius had suggested, in order to come to his help against Balas, Jonathan considered primarily his own interests and those of his nation. These required the immediate renovation of the Temple fortress, which had been much weakened by Lysias (ch. vi. 62) and Alcimus (ch. ix. 54).

11. the mount Sion.] I.e. the Temple mount. (See the comment on ch. iv. 37.)

with square stones.] Rather, "squared stones" — stones hewn into a rectangular form. Ordinary fortifications were often constructed of stones that were unhewn and of irregular shapes.

12. the strangers.] The foreign garrisons, placed by Bacchides in the various strongholds which he fortified in different parts of the country (ch. ix. 50–52).

15. king Alexander . . . heard.] The importance of an alliance with the Jews had not occurred to Alexander at first. It was only when he heard of the offers made by his rival, that he woke up to an appreciation of the aid which it was in their power to render to the side whose cause they espoused. He was thus somewhat tardy in his application. He had it, however, in his favour,—1. That no bitter memories overshadowed his past—2. That there was no reason to doubt his good faith. It may also have been an important circumstance in his favour that he was known to have the support of Rome, and that an alliance with him would certainly not injure the Jews with their Western protectors.

the battles and noble acts which he and

B. C. cir. 152.

16 He said, Shall we find such another man? now therefore we will make him our friend and confederate.

17 Upon this he wrote a letter, and sent it unto him, according to these words, saying,

18 King Alexander to his brother Jonathan sendeth greeting:

19 We have heard of thee, that thou art a man of great power, and meet to be our friend.

20 Wherefore now this day we ordain thee to be the high priest of thy nation, and to be called the king's friend; (and therewithal he sent him a purple robe and a crown of gold:) and require thee to take our part, and keep friendship with us.

B. C. cir. 152.

21 So in the seventh month of the hundred and sixtieth year, at the feast of the tabernacles, Jonathan put on the holy robe, and gathered together forces, and provided much armour.

22 Whereof when Demetrius heard, he was very sorry, and said,

23 What have we done, that Alexander hath prevented us in making amity with the Jews to strengthen himself?

24 I also will write unto them words of encouragement, and promise them dignities and gifts, that I may have their aid.

his brethren had done.] See above, ch. iii.–vii. and ch. ix.

18. King Alexander to his brother Jonathan.] The expression "brother" was a full acknowledgment of Jonathan's independence and actual sovereignty. Demetrius had not gone nearly so far. We may fairly conclude that the concession, which was not a mere flattery (Grimm), had considerable weight in determining Jonathan to accept the alliance of Balas.

19. We have heard.] The plural of dignity was commonly affected by the Oriental kings, from an early, though not from the very earliest, date. Traces of its use are found in Herodotus (i. 32, 35). But it scarcely seems to have become the ordinary form of speech until the time of which our author treats. (Compare ch. xi. 31–35, xiii. 37–40, xv. 9; 2 Macc. xi. 23–26, 28, 29, &c.) Even then it was frequently superseded by the first person singular. (See below, vv. 29–40, 52–56; xi. 9, 10; xv. 3–6, &c.)

20. we ordain thee to be the high priest of thy nation.] The Syrian kings, from the time of Epiphanes, had claimed the right of appointing the Jewish High Priests from among the qualified persons, i.e. from among the descendants of Aaron. Epiphanes had appointed successively as High Priests Jason and Menelaus, deposing Onias to make room for Jason, and Jason to make room for Menelaus (2 Macc. iv. 7–26). Demetrius had given the office to Alcimus (supra, vii. 9). Since the death of Alcimus in B.C. 159 (ix. 56) it had remained vacant, neither Jonathan nor any other person having ventured to assume the position, and Demetrius having made no fresh appointment. It now occurred to Balas, or his advisers, that it would be an excellent way of securing the favour of Jonathan to confer the office on him, since he could not but covet it, and his accepting it at the hands of Balas would be an acknowledgment of him as Syrian king.

and to be called the king's friend.] See the comment on ch. ii. 18.

a purple robe and a crown of gold.] The symbols of sovereignty. Compare ch. viii. 14, and the comment ad loc.

21. in the seventh month.] The seventh (Jewish) month, Ethanim or Tisri, corresponding with the latter part of September and the earlier of October, would be the twelfth Syrian month of the year. The Feast of Tabernacles was on the fifteenth day of the month (Lev. xxiii. 34).

the holy robe.] Not the "purple robe" which Balas had sent him (v. 20), but the entire priestly dress (στολήν), as described in Ex. xxviii. 4–39.

22. Demetrius . . was very sorry.] Literally, "was grieved." He saw that he had been outbid—he had missed a great opportunity by not offering terms sufficiently liberal at once. Still, he hoped that it might not be too late to retrieve his error; and certainly the terms that he now submitted for the consideration of the people were sufficiently liberal. As Ewald observes, "there seems every reason to regard the document contained in vv. 25–45 of this chapter as genuine, and of high historical importance" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 328, note 2). It throws a large amount of light on the ordinary fiscal relations subsisting between the Syrian monarchs and their Jewish subjects.

24. promise them dignities.] Rather, "promise them exaltation." It was a general

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 152. 25 He sent unto them therefore to this effect: King Demetrius unto the people of the Jews sendeth greeting:

26 Whereas ye have kept covenants with us, and continued in our friendship, not joining yourselves with our enemies, we have heard hereof, and are glad.

27 Wherefore now continue ye still to be faithful unto us, and we will well recompense you for the things ye do in our behalf, 28 And will grant you many immunities, and give you rewards. B. C. 152.

29 And now do I free you, and for your sake I release all the Jews, from tributes, and from the customs of salt, and from crown taxes,

30 And from that which appertaineth unto me to receive for the third part of the seed, and the half of the fruit of the trees, I release it from this day forth, so that they shall not be taken of the land of Judea, nor of the three governments which elevation of their position among his subjects, rather than any special "dignities" or offices, that Demetrius now offered.

25. King Demetrius unto the people of the Jews.] The contrast between this address and that of Balas (v. 18) is striking. Demetrius ignores Jonathan altogether, regarding him doubtless as pledged to his rival, and addresses himself to the "people," whom he perhaps hopes to separate from their leader. Throughout his whole long letter he makes no allusion to Jonathan's existence.

26. Whereas ye have kept covenants with us.] Rather, "your covenants." As no overt act of hostility had been yet committed, Demetrius is able to assume the friendliness of the Jews towards himself, and their fidelity to the engagements which existed between him and them (ch. ix. 70–72). He thinks it prudent to take this line, as making it easier for them to revert to his alliance, if so disposed.

28. many immunities.] Literally, "remissions." (See the enumeration of them in vv. 29–31.)

29. I free you, and for your sake I release all the Jews.] There is nothing corresponding to "for your sake" in the original. By "you" Demetrius means the Jewish community in Palestine; by "all the Jews," all those settled in any part of his dominions. There were many thousands at Antioch.

from tributes.] Rather, "from the poll-tax." In Oriental countries, a poll-tax (not necessarily the same for all) is always levied on all the inhabitants. It is ordinarily levied by the head men of each town and village, and remitted by them to the government. The Syro-Macedonians, and after them the Romans, kept up the immemorial practice (Luke xx. 22, xxiii. 2; Rom. xiii. 6).

from the customs of salt.] Or "from the duty on salt." The salt of Palestine was derived chiefly from the Dead Sea, where it is formed naturally. Private persons were allowed to collect it, but had to pay a duty, of the nature of an excise, to the government before removing what they had collected. The effect was to raise the price of salt to the consumer generally.

and from crown taxes.] Rather, "from the payment in lieu of crowns." It had been customary for the subject-nations to make presents of crowns of gold to the reigning monarch on various occasions, as when he gained a victory, or recovered from an illness, or when they had any petition to ask of him. In course of time it was thought convenient to commute this irregular and voluntary payment into a fixed sum due to the government annually, and known as φόρος στεφανίτης (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 3, § 3) or στεφανικὸν τέλεσμα (Suidas), corresponding to the Roman aurum coronarium (Cic. 'Leg. Agr.' ii. 22). This is the payment of which Demetrius offered the remission.

30. And from that which appertaineth unto me to receive for the third part of the seed.] Rather, "for the third part of the crop." Σπορὰ is used here for the "crop" or "produce," as σπόρος is more commonly (Herod. iv. 53; Soph. 'Philoct.' l. 706, &c.). In Oriental countries, as much as one-half of the produce is said to have been sometimes claimed by the state (Mirkhond, 'Histoire des Sassanides,' p. 372); and the same proportion was required of the Spartan helots (Tyrt. Fr. 5; Pausan. iv. 14, § 3). The payment in kind had, under the Seleucidæ, been commuted for a payment in money.

and the half of the fruit of the trees.] Rather, "and for the half," &c. The tree-tax had been commuted, like the corn-tax. A tax on fruit-trees has been common in the East in all ages. (See Tabari, 'Chronique,' vol. ii. p. 226; Maçoudi, 'Prairies d'Or,' vol. ii. p. 204.)

the three governments which are added thereunto.] Compare v. 38, and see also ch. xi.

B. C. 152. are added thereunto out of the country of Samaria and Galilee, from this day forth for evermore.

31 Let Jerusalem also be holy and free, with the borders thereof, both from tenths and tributes.

32 And as for the tower which is at Jerusalem, I yield up my authority over it, and give it to the high priest, that he may set in it such men as he shall choose to keep it.

33 Moreover I freely set at liberty every one of the Jews, that were B. C. 152. carried captives out of the land of Judea into any part of my kingdom, and I will that all my officers remit the tributes even of their cattle.

34 Furthermore I will that all the feasts, and sabbaths, and new moons, and solemn days, and the three days before the feast, and the three days after the feast, shall be all days of immunity and freedom for all the Jews in my realm.

28, 34. It appears from ch. xi. 34, that these "governments" were named respectively Aphærema, Lydda, and Ramathem (= Ramathaim). "Aphærema" is thought to be a Greek corruption of the Hebrew word "Ephraim," and to designate the most southern part of the Samaritan territory. Lydda must be the tract about that town, which lay on the edge of the plain of Sharon, north-west of Jerusalem. Ramathem is probably the tract about Ramathaim, the city of Samuel's father (1 Sam. i. 1), the exact position of which is unknown. Under what circumstances these three districts had been detached from Samaria and added to Judæa, we have no record; but the transfer had probably been made to punish some Samaritan rebellion. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. pp. 227, 228.)

and Galilee.] These words seem superfluous, and are quite out of place here. Elsewhere the three districts are uniformly represented as Samaritan; and Galilee was too far off for any portion of it to have been attached to Judæa at this period. If not the error of a scribe, accustomed to couple Galilee with Samaria, the words must be ascribed to an error on the part of the author.

31. both from tenths and tributes.] Rather, "and the tithes, and the taxes." Jerusalem was to be free of all payments to the crown, and so were to be the tithes collected for the support of the Levitical priesthood, and the taxes levied on the Jews by the native authorities for the support of the fabric and service of the Temple (Neh. x. 32–37). No deduction was to be made from either of these two sources of revenue for the benefit of the Syrian exchequer.

32. as for the tower.] Compare ch. i. 33–36; and see, in the present chapter, vv. 6–9.

I . . . give it to the high priest.] Demetrius speaks as though he were ignorant who had assumed the office of High Priest, but concluded that the nation, under the circumstances, would set one up. There can be little doubt that he knew of Jonathan's elevation, and purposely ignored it.

33. I freely set at liberty every one of the Jews that were carried captives.] This is a new point. In the wars between the Syrians and the patriotic party in Judæa a large number of captives must have been made. These languished in confinement in various parts of the Syrian dominions. It was a tempting offer to the friends of the captives, that they should, all of them, be at once set free.

I will that all my officers remit the tributes even of their cattle.] This is obscure. By the context, the remission should concern especially the captive Israelites; but it is not likely that they would possess cattle. If the concession was to be general, perhaps Josephus may not have been far wrong in explaining it as an exemption of the Jewish animals from compulsory employment in the service of the Syrian state. (See Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 2, § 3.)

34. all the feasts . . . and solemn days.] A distinction seems to be intended between the recognised feasts, whether commanded in the Law, or established by ecclesiastical authority, and occasional days appointed (ἀποδεδειγμένοι) from time to time to be kept holy by those to whom the right of such appointment belonged. Both classes of days were to be equally days of state exemption for the Jewish community. The exemption was to consist of ἀτέλεια, "freedom from tax"—the advantage of which, when limited to certain days, is not very apparent, and ἄφεσις, "remission of state claims on their time," which would clearly have been a considerable boon to certain classes—e.g. soldiers, state officials, and other employés.

the three days before the feast, and the three days after the feast.] The time commonly spent in their journeys backwards and forwards by such Syrian Jews as were in the habit of attending the great Jewish festivals.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 152. 35 Also no man shall have authority to meddle with them, or to molest any of them in any matter.

36 I will further, that there be enrolled among the king's forces about thirty thousand men of the Jews, unto whom pay shall be given, as belongeth to all the king's forces.

37 And of them some shall be placed in the king's strong holds, of whom also some shall be set over the affairs of the kingdom, which are of trust: and I will that their overseers and governors be of themselves, and ‖ Gr. walk. that they ‖ live after their own laws, even as the king hath commanded in B. C. 152. the land of Judea.

38 And concerning the three governments that are added to Judea from the country of Samaria, let them be joined with Judea, that they may be reckoned to be under one, nor bound to obey other authority than the high priest's.

39 As for Ptolemais, and the land pertaining thereto, I give it as a free gift to the sanctuary at Jerusalem for the necessary expences ‖ of the sanctuary.

‖ Or, of the holy things.

40 Moreover I give every year

35. no man shall have authority to meddle with them.] We must understand, "at such times." Demetrius could not mean that no one should under any circumstances arrest, or take legal proceedings against, a Jew.

36. I will further, that there be enrolled among the king's forces about thirty thousand men of the Jews.] The enrolment of Jews among the king's forces would mark them as full citizens, trusted to bear arms, and receive a military training, as much as any others. It was a privilege, and not a burthen, especially as the soldiers received pay. The number, 30,000, would be surprising, if the Jews of Palestine only were meant; but we must remember that there were large colonies of Jews in various parts of the Empire, as, especially, at Antioch, Babylon, Seleucia, Nearda, &c.; and that the Jews of those places might have been glad to take military service.

37. And of them some shall be placed in the king's strong holds.] A further mark of confidence. The Jews were to be employed, equally with the rest of the Syrian troops, in garrison duty.

of whom also some shall be set over the affairs of the kingdom, which are of trust.] An employment of Jews in offices of trust is here promised; but the nature of the offices is not specified. The promise was vague, and might easily have been evaded. It certainly did not amount to a declaration that Jews were to be regarded as "qualified for all offices" (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 328).

I will that their overseers and governors be of themselves.] This would, no doubt, have been a considerable boon. It would have secured the Jews from having heathen governors placed over them. Still it would have admitted of their being subjected to the tender mercies of renegades and Hellenizers, such as Menelaus and Alcimus.

and that they live after their own laws.] An entire revocation of the edict of Epiphanes (ch. i. 41–50), by which the Jews were required to "leave their laws," and "follow the strange laws" which he made the "law of the land" (ib. v. 44).

38. concerning the three governments.] See the comment on v. 30. It is probable that these districts had hitherto had separate governors, or a separate governor. Now they were to be subjected to the sole authority of the High Priest. The ungrammatical construction of the Greek, which follows a Hebrew idiom, does not introduce any ambiguity into the meaning of the stipulation.

39. As for Ptolemais, . . . I give it as a free gift.] It is pertinently remarked, that Ptolemaïs was not now in the possession of Demetrius, so that he could give it away. Ptolemaïs was exactly the place where the rival king had established his court, and fixed his government. It was, no doubt, selected to be made over to the Jews on this account. The appeal made to them was to this effect—"If you will lend your assistance to crush Balas and recover Ptolemaïs, which has proclaimed him king, the city and its territory shall be ceded to you as a permanent possession." To have greater weight with the religious Jews, the ceded territory was made part of the endowment of the Temple.

40. Moreover I give every year fifteen thousand shekels.] Rather, "I for my part," or "I, in my own person, give," &c. This is put in contrast with the gift—given once for all—of the revenues of Ptolemaïs. The context shews that it was to be a contribution on the part of the king to the Temple service. Fifteen thousand shekels of the Maccabee period would be worth from twelve to fifteen hundred pounds sterling.

B. C. 152. fifteen thousand shekels of silver out of the king's accounts from the places appertaining.

41 And all the overplus, which the officers payed not in as in former time, from henceforth shall be given toward the works of the temple.

42 And beside this, the five thousand shekels of silver, which they took from the uses of the temple out of the accounts year by year, even those things shall be released, because they appertain to the priests that minister.

43 And whosoever they be that flee unto the temple at Jerusalem, or be within the liberties thereof, being indebted unto the king, or for any other matter, let them be at liberty, and all that they have in my realm.

44 For the building also and repairing of the works of the sanctuary expences shall be given of the king's accounts. B. C. 152

45 Yea, and for the building of the walls of Jerusalem, and the fortifying thereof round about, expences shall be given out of the king's accounts, as also for the building of the walls in Judea.

46 Now when Jonathan and the people heard these words, they gave no credit unto them, nor received them, because they remembered the great evil that he had done in Israel; for he had afflicted them very sore.

47 But with Alexander they were well pleased, because he was the first that entreated of true peace with out of the king's accounts.] To be deducted, that is, from the balance due to the king, and to be kept back by the Jewish authorities.

from the places appertaining.] Rather, "from the (most) convenient places."

41. all the overplus, which the officers payed not in as in former time.] The intention of this is obscure. It would most naturally point to the outstanding debts due to the treasury from the collectors of taxes; but it is difficult, in that case, to understand the expression "as in former time"—literally "as in the first years"—since under any system of taxation there will always be such arrears. Perhaps in the first years of the Syrian rule the practice had been that these arrears of the king's taxes went to the Temple treasury, and Demetrius proposed a restoration of the system. "As in the first years" must then be connected with what follows, not with what precedes it.

42. beside this, the five thousand shekels, &c.] A temple tax of 5000 shekels a year had, apparently, been exacted by the Syrian monarchs. This Demetrius proposed to remit.

43. whosoever they be that flee unto the temple.] The right of asylum, which the Greeks regarded as attaching, in some degree or other, to all their own temples, was to be recognised as belonging in a high degree to the Temple at Jerusalem. It was to be possessed, not only by the main building, but by all its purlieus and precincts (ὅρια), and was to cover, not only criminals, but debtors —or at any rate, crown debtors. Even the goods of such debtors were to be safe from attachment, during their abode in the Temple.

44. For the building also and repairing of the works of the sanctuary.] See above, vv. 10, 11.

of the king's accounts.] Rather, "out of the king's accounts."

45. for the building of the walls in Judea.] Rather, "for the building of the forts," or "strongholds." Compare above, ch. ix. 50–52. Demetrius was ready to undertake all these expenses, but of course on the implied condition that Jerusalem and the "strongholds" should be held for him, and against his adversary.

46. when Jonathan and the people heard these words.] Demetrius failed to stir up any jealousy or dissension between the people and their leader. Liberal as his offers were, and tempting as they might have been, if regarded as an honest expression of his intentions with respect to the Jewish nation, they had under the circumstances no weight or power of attraction. They were regarded as extorted from him by his needs, and no confidence was felt that he would consider himself bound to their observance, if he should succeed in crushing Balas.

he had afflicted them very sore.] Through Alcimus, Bacchides, and Nicanor. See especially ch. vii. 16, 19, 22, 34; ch. ix. 2, 25–27, &c.

47. he was the first that entreated of true peace with them.] Our translators have in-

B. C. 152. them, and they were confederate with him always.

cir. 150. 48 Then gathered king Alexander great forces, and camped over against Demetrius.

49 And after the two kings had joined battle, Demetrius' host fled: but Alexander followed after him, and prevailed against them.

50 And he continued the battle very sore until the sun went down: and that day was Demetrius slain. B. C. 150.

51 Afterward Alexander sent ambassadors to Ptolemee king of Egypt with a message to this effect:

52 Forasmuch as I am come again to my realm, and am set in the throne of my progenitors, and have serted the epithet "true" before "peace," without any warrant from the original, in order to overcome the difficulty which arises from the fact, recorded earlier in the chapter (vv. 3–6), that Demetrius, and not Balas, began the negotiations. In point of fact, there is a contradiction between vv. 3 and 47, which cannot be got over. As Homer "nods" sometimes, so does our author.

§ 2. The War between Demetrius and Balas—Defeat and Death of Demetrius.

48-50. The details of the war between Demetrius and Alexander Balas are but little known. It appears to have lasted somewhat more than two years (B.C. 152–150). Attalus, king of Pergamus, induced Balas to come forward, but did not at first support him with his troops. After his seizure of Ptolemaïs, or Acre, in B.C. 152, Demetrius attacked him, and in the first engagement gained a decided victory (Justin, xxxv. 1). Attalus then took part in the war openly, as did Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt, and Ariarathes V. of Cappadocia. Thus strengthened, Balas fought a second battle, which is the one here spoken of (vv. 49, 50). The fortunes of the fight were chequered; but in the end Balas was victorious, and Demetrius was slain (Justin, l. s. c.; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 2, § 4).

48. Then gathered king Alexander great forces.] Justin tells us that the three kings, Attalus, Ptolemy, and Ariarathes, sent their forces to his aid: Porphyry says he had an army of mercenaries, and contingents from Ptolemy and Attalus (Euseb. 'Chr. Can.' i. 40, § 15).

49. Demetrius' host fled.] According to Josephus, Demetrius had at first the advantage. After inflicting a great slaughter, he put the army of Balas to flight, and was hotly pursuing them, when his horse became entangled in a bog and threw him, whereupon he was overpowered and slain ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 2, § 4). The party of Balas then gained the day. Justin also says that Demetrius had "killed many thousands," before he fell fighting bravely in the thick of the struggle. The battle must have taken place about August, B.C. 150 (Clinton, 'F. H.' vol. iii. p. 324), when Demetrius had held the throne for nearly twelve years. (See ch. vii. 1.)

§ 3. The Marriage of Balas with Cleopatra, Daughter of Ptolemy Philometor—Honours paid to Jonathan at the Time of the Wedding.

51–66. It was natural that Balas should wish to strengthen himself by a matrimonial alliance. Upstarts are always eager to obtain admittance into the family circle of kings; and Balas was an upstart of an exceedingly weak character, who could feel no confidence in himself. The Syrian monarchs had already intermarried with the Ptolemies, so that there would be nothing strange or unusual in the proposal of another such alliance. Ptolemy Philometor readily accepted it, expecting no doubt to gain something for himself by the transaction. The author relates the affair of the marriage mainly on account of the honours paid to Jonathan at the time of its celebration (vv. 59–65).

51. Ptolemee king of Egypt.] The Ptolemy contemporary with Balas was Ptolemy VI. (Philometor), who ascended the Egyptian throne in B.C. 181 and reigned till B.C. 146. He became king at the age of seven, and was consequently at this time about 38 or 39 years of age. Demetrius had angered him by an attempt to obtain possession of Cyprus, which was an appanage of the Egyptian crown; and, though the attempt failed, Philometor never forgave it. His support of Balas, even to the extent of accepting him for a son-in-law, was, in fact, a mode of avenging his wrongs. But it may also have been dictated by policy. Balas was so weak that Philometor may have expected to wrest from him Cœle-Syria and Palestine—the desire of Egypt at this time—without much difficulty. (See ch. xi. 1.) with a message.] he message was probably sent off almost immediately after the battle. Balas at once assumed all the airs of a great king. He takes to himself the whole credit of the victory, without any mention of the aid lent him by Ptolemy and the other kings. He, of course, assumes his legitimacy,

B. C. 150. gotten the dominion, and overthrown Demetrius, and recovered our country;

53 For after I had joined battle with him, both he and his host was discomfited by us, so that we sit in the throne of his kingdom:

54 Now therefore let us make a league of amity together, and give me now thy daughter to wife: and I will be thy son in law, and will give both thee and her gifts according to thy dignity.

55 Then Ptolemee the king gave answer, saying, Happy be the day wherein thou didst return into the land of thy fathers, and satest in the throne of their kingdom.

56 And now will I do to thee, as thou hast written: meet me therefore at Ptolemais, that we may see one another; for I will marry my daughter to thee according to thy B. C. 150 desire.

57 So Ptolemee went out of Egypt with his daughter Cleopatra, and they came unto Ptolemais in the hundred threescore and second year:

58 Where king Alexander meeting him, he gave unto him his daughter Cleopatra, and celebrated her marriage at Ptolemais with great glory, as the manner of kings is.

59 Now king Alexander had written unto Jonathan, that he should come and meet him.

60 Who thereupon went honourably to Ptolemais, where he met the two kings, and gave them and their friends silver and gold, and many presents, and found favour in their sight.

61 At that time certain pestilent fellows of Israel, men of a wicked and claims descent from the old line of the Syrian monarchs. He addresses Ptolemy as altogether his equal, if not his superior, and demands, rather than requests, his daughter in marriage.

54. I . . . will give both thee and her gifts.] Presents to the bride and her father (ἔδνα, ἕεδνα) were usually made before marriage by the Greeks. The bride's portion was called φερνή, and became part of her dower; the father's represented the actual purchase-money of primitive times. The character of the gifts varied according to the rank of the parties.

56. now will I do to thee, as thou hast written.] Ptolemy's ready acceptance of the proposal of Balas is not, perhaps, surprising. He may have believed him to be a son of Epiphanes, in which case the match would have been an equal one; and he may have expected to derive advantage of some kind or other from the connection, although the exact nature of the advantage could scarcely have been as yet apparent. It would depend on circumstances and the character of Balas.

meet me therefore at Ptolemais.] The message of Balas had probably been sent from Antioch, whither he no doubt proceeded after his victory. But Ptolemaïs, halfway between Egypt and Antioch, seemed to Philometor a more convenient place for the wedding. He proposed, therefore, to bring his daughter thither.

57. in the hundred threescore and second year.] The 162nd Seleucid year would commence in October B.C. 151, and terminate in October B.C. 150. It was probably towards the close of the year that the wedding took place.

59. Now king Alexander had written unto Jonathan.] Here we have the first hint of the writer's purpose in dwelling so long upon the wedding. It is Maccabee, not Syrian, history that he is writing; and, but for Jonathan being a guest at the wedding, he might scarcely have noticed it. He regards the occasion, however, as having greatly redounded to Jonathan's glory; since, 1, he went there on special invitation: 2, he stayed there as an equal and companion of two of the greatest kings of the East; 3, he received special honours while there, which are described in vv. 62–65.

60. went honourably to Ptolemais.] Rather, "went magnificently." A large train and much display of wealth are implied in the expression, μετὰ δόξης.

he . . . gave them and their friends . . . many presents.] According to the usual Eastern custom. It was especially incumbent on a king to be lavish of gifts (Xen. 'Cyrop.' viii. 2); and Jonathan, having been raised to the kingly rank (supra, vv. 18–20), contrived by some means or other to obtain sufficient wealth to play the part of king nobly.

61. certain pestilent fellows.] Literally, "men (who were) pests." The expression, rare in Greek (Demosth. in Reiske's 'Orat.

B. C. 150. life, assembled themselves against him, to accuse him: but the king would not hear them.

62 Yea more than that, the king commanded to take off his garments, and clothe him in purple: and they did so.

63 Also he made him sit by himself, and said unto his princes, Go with him into the midst of the city, and make proclamation, that no man complain against him of any matter, and that no man trouble him for any manner of cause.

64 Now when his accusers saw that he was honoured according to the proclamation, and clothed in purple, they fled all away. B. C. 150.

65 So the king honoured him, and wrote him among his chief friends, and made him a duke, and ‖partaker of his dominion.

‖ Or, governor of a province.

66 Afterward Jonathan returned to Jerusalem with peace and gladness.

67 Furthermore in the hundred threescore and fifth year came Demetrius son of Demetrius out of Crete into the land of his fathers: cir. 148.

Att.' 794. 5), is common enough in Latin, and is well rendered in our Version.

men of a wicked life.] Literally, "men who were transgressors of the law." Probably no more is meant than by the customary ἄνομοι (ch. ii. 44; iii. 6; vii. 5; ix. 23, 58, &c.), men who had given up the observance of the Jewish law, and regarded it as no longer binding. Such persons did not necessarily lead an immoral life. On the contrary, they often sought to recommend their views by strictness and purity of living. It was natural that the leaders of the Hellenizing party, finding that Jonathan was in such favour, should make a last effort to discredit him with the Syrian king.

62. the king commanded to . . . clothe him in purple.] Jonathan had, apparently, not yet assumed the royal apparel which had been conceded to him (v. 20). At this time the efforts of his enemies resulted in his open and manifest exaltation to the royal dignity.

63. Also he made him sit by himself.] I.e., "he (Balas) made him (Jonathan) take the seat by his side"—perhaps on the same throne—thus publicly exhibiting him as his equal.

Go with him into the midst of the city, and make proclamation.] Compare Gen. xli. 43; Esther vi. 9–11. The main object was to make Jonathan's royal dignity known as widely as possible.

65. the king . . . wrote him among his chief friends.] It is implied that there was a catalogue in which the names of the "king's friends" were inscribed, as there was of "royal benefactors" among the Achæmenian Persians (Herod. viii. 85; Esther ii. 23, vi. 1). It appears further that there were gradations of rank among the "friends," the bulk of them forming an "ordinary" class, while a certain number were recognised as "chief friends." (See the comment on ch. ii. 18.)

made him a duke.] Rather, "a general"—i.e. gave him the rank of general in his army. The Latin dux did not come to have a mere titular force till after the time of Constantine.

partaker of his dominion.] Rather, "provincial ruler," or "governor of a district." The word used is rare, being only found in this place and in Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 5, § 5).

§ 4. DEMETRIUS II. CLAIMS THE SYRIAN CROWN—WAR BETWEEN HIS GENERAL, APOLLONIUS, AND JONATHAN—SUCCESS OF JONATHAN, AND FRESH HONOURS GRANTED TO HIM.

67–89. Balas was scarcely settled on the throne when he shewed himself quite unfit for sovereignty. He committed the affairs of the kingdom to a certain Ammonius, who robbed and murdered at his pleasure, while his master gave himself up to all kinds of vicious indulgences. He thus alienated the affections of his subjects, and gave an opportunity to the son of the late king, of which he was not slow to take advantage. In B.C. 148–7, when Balas had been king about two years, this prince left Crete, where he had been staying, accompanied by a body of Cretan mercenaries, and, landing on the coast of Cilicia, assumed the title of king. Alexander, on hearing the intelligence, quitted Ptolemaïs, his favourite residence, and went first to Antioch (v. 68) and thence into Cilicia (ch. xi. 14), where he endeavoured to crush the revolt. Meanwhile Jonathan maintained his cause in Palestine against the general Apollonius, who held Cœlesyria for Demetrius, and obtained the important successes which are related in vv. 74–86. Balas shewed his gratitude by conferring on the victorious Maccabee a new dignity and an increase of dominion (vv. 88, 89).

67. in the hundred threescore and fifth year.] The 165th Seleucid year began in

B. C. cir. 148.

68 Whereof when king Alexander heard tell, he was right sorry, and returned into Antioch.

69 Then Demetrius made Apollonius the governor of Celosyria his general, who gathered together a great host, and camped in Jamnia, and sent unto Jonathan the high priest, saying,

70 Thou alone liftest up thyself against us, and I am laughed to scorn for thy sake, and reproached: and why dost thou vaunt thy power against us in the mountains?

71 Now therefore, if thou trustest in thine own strength, come down to us into the plain field, and there let us try the matter together: for with me is the power of the cities.

72 Ask and learn who I am, and the rest that take our part, and they shall tell thee that thy foot is not able to stand before our face; for thy fathers have been twice put to flight in their own land.

73 Wherefore now thou shalt not be able to abide the horsemen and so

B. C. cir. 148.

October B.C. 148, and ended in October B.C. 147.

Demetrius, son of Demetrius.] The elder Demetrius, when attacked by Balas, sent his two sons, Demetrius and Antiochus, to Cnidus, to the care of a friend. Neither of them was grown up at the time (B.C. 152). Four years later, the elder, Demetrius, having attained to manhood according to Eastern ideas, came forward and claimed his father's crown (Justin, xxxv. 2).

out of Crete.] Demetrius, when he determined to assert his rights, seems to have left Cnidus and gone to Crete, where he collected a body of mercenaries, with whom he crossed the sea and landed on the coast of Cilicia (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 4, § 3).

68. king Alexander . . . returned into Antioch.] From Ptolemaïs, which he had made his principal capital.

69. Demetrius made Apollonius the governor of Celosyria his general.] The form of expression used shews that Apollonius was already governor under Balas. His defection must have been a severe blow to that monarch's cause, as Celosyria, or rather Cœlesyria, embraced the entire tract between Emesa (Hems) and the borders of Egypt. It has been suggested that the Apollonius here mentioned was the foster-brother and friend of the elder Demetrius, of whom Polybius speaks (xxxi. 21, § 2), who accompanied him when he made his escape from Rome (Grimm). The supposition is not improbable, and would account for the part which Apollonius played.

Jamnia.] See the comment on ch. iv. 15. Jamnia lay almost due west of Jerusalem, at the distance of about thirty miles. It was in the Shefelah, or low coast plain.

sent unto Jonathan.] Challenges to combat, conveyed in insulting terms, were not uncommon in the ancient world, and with the Greeks had the sanction of Homeric usage. It was expected that taunts would rouse passions strong enough to overpower reason, and lead men to fight at a disadvantage.

70. Thou alone.] The expression in the original is stronger—σὺ μονώτατος—"thou altogether by thyself."

why dost thou vaunt thy power against us in the mountains?] The character of the hill-country of Judæa no doubt gave its defenders a certain advantage, though the elevation of the hills is not great, in no case exceeding 4000 feet. There was no call upon Jonathan, either of duty or of honour, to forego this advantage.

71. with me is the power of the cities.] The force of this argument is not quite clear. Perhaps Apollonius means that he might shut himself up in his walled cities, if he liked, as Jonathan shut himself up in his fastnesses, and that thus there was no unfairness in his asking the Jewish leader to come down and fight him in the open plain. Each side would be making a sacrifice.

72. thy fathers have been twice put to flight in their own land.] By "thy fathers" we are probably to understand "thy predecessors"—"those who have headed this revolt before thee"—Apollonius not caring to be accurate about the relationship. What two occasions are intended is uncertain; but probably one of them is the battle in which Judas was slain (ch. ix. 14–18), while the other may be either the defeat of Joseph and Azarias (ch. v. 60), or that of Judas near Beth-Zacharias, which was partially redeemed by the exploit of Eleazar (ch. vi. 42–47). It is surprising that Apollonius did not enlarge his taunt, since there were more occasions of defeat than these. (See ch. ii. 38; v. 67; vii. 19; ix. 2, 36, &c.)

73. thou shalt not be able to abide the horsemen.] Cavalry was the arm in which the Syrians placed their principal trust. In B.C. 166–5 Nicanor and Gorgias brought into the field 7000 horse (ch. iii. 39); and Lysias, in the ensuing year, had 5000 (ch. iv. 28).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 148. great a power in the plain, where is neither stone nor flint, nor place to flee unto.

74 So when Jonathan heard these words of Apollonius, he was moved in his mind, and choosing ten thousand men he went out of Jerusalem, where Simon his brother met him for to help him.

75 And he pitched his tents against Joppe: but they of Joppe shut him out of the city, because Apollonius had a garrison there.

76 Then Jonathan laid siege unto it: whereupon they of the city let him in for fear: and so Jonathan won Joppe.

B. C. cir. 148.

77 Whereof when Apollonius heard, he took three thousand horsemen, with a great host of footmen, and went to Azotus [a]as one that journeyed, and therewithal [b]drew him forth into the plain, because he had a great number of horsemen, in whom he put his trust.

[a] Or, as though he would pass through it.

[b] Or, led his company.

78 Then Jonathan followed after him to Azotus, where the armies joined battle.

The horsemen of the same commander in B.C. 163–2 are reckoned at 20,000 (ch. vi. 30). Cavalry, however, was of little service among the Judæan hills, which were unsuitable for its movements; and an army, the chief strength of which was in its horse, would naturally desire to meet its enemy "in the plain."

where is neither stone nor flint.] Rather, "neither stone nor shingle." The statement is an exaggeration, but expresses in a graphic way the general contrast that exists between the hill-country of Judæa and the low Philistine plain at its base.

nor place to flee unto.] Rather, "nor place for flight." In the plain there was no place where flight would not be disastrous, and consequently no situation that tempted to it.

74. when Jonathan heard these words, . . . he was moved in his mind.] The taunts used had their intended effect. Unlike the great Fabius (Liv. xxii. 12), Jonathan allowed himself to be "moved" by them, and descended from the high ground to the level plain, there to meet his rival. Better fortune than he deserved awaited him (vv. 78–84).

choosing ten thousand men.] Judas, as we have seen (v. 36), had at one time brought into the field more than 13,000. Jonathan seems now to have at his command not fewer than 20,000. (See Grimm, ad loc.) where Simon his brother met him.] Rather, "and Simon, his brother, met him." The place of meeting is not indicated.

75. he pitched his tents against Joppe.] Joppe, or Joppa (now Jaffa), is generally spoken of as "the port of Jerusalem." It was the principal harbour on the sea-board belonging to Judæa, which was of restricted dimensions, shut in by Philistia on the one hand and Phœnicia on the other. Allotted to Dan at the time of Joshua's conquest of Palestine (Josh. xix. 46), and apparently reoccupied at the return from the Captivity (Ezra iii. 7), it had at all times a Jewish population, which may have encouraged Jonathan to select it as the object of his first attempt against Apollonius. It would seem to be implied, in the latter part of the verse, that the population would have admitted him within the walls at once, had they not been overawed by the foreign garrison which Apollonius had put there.

76. they of the city.] I.e. "the native inhabitants." They took heart after a while, and admitted Jonathan despite the Syrian garrison.

77. he took three thousand horsemen.] Literally, "he put under arms," or "formed an expedition of" three thousand horsemen, &c. These evidently constituted his main force, and were his chief dependence (v. 73). It might well have seemed that in the smooth Philistian plain they would be irresistible.

and went to Azotus as one that journeyed.] Instead of marching northwards from Jamnia (v. 69) against Joppa, Apollonius, as though unconscious or careless of Jonathan's movement, proceeded southwards, as if he were making a mere tour of inspection, towards Azotus, spreading his troops over the plain, and thus tempting Jonathan to make an attack upon him.

and therewithal drew him forth into the plain.] Rather, "and therewithal kept advancing into the plain." Προῆγεν is imperfect, not aorist, and intransitive, not transitive. The action of Apollonius in spreading his troops is described.

78. Jonathan followed after him to Azotus.] Thus, once more, taking the exact course which Apollonius desired, and for which his plans had been laid. Apollonius must have been delighted to see that his enemy fell, as it seemed, blindly into the trap laid for him.

where the armies joined battle.] This is said with some vagueness. The armies joined

B. C. cir. 148.

79 Now Apollonius had left a thousand horsemen in ambush.

80 And Jonathan knew that there was an ambushment behind him; for they had compassed in his host, and cast darts at the people, from morning till evening.

81 But the people stood still, as Jonathan had commanded them: and so the ‖ enemies' horses were tired.

‖ Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 8.

82 Then brought Simon forth his host, and set them against the footmen, (for the horsemen were spent,) who were discomfited by him, and fled.

83 The horsemen also, being scattered in the field, fled to Azotus, and went into Beth-dagon, their idol's temple, for safety.

B. C. cir. 148.

84 But Jonathan set fire on Azotus, and the cities round about it, and took their spoils; and the temple of Dagon, with them that were fled into it, he burned with fire.

85 Thus there were burned and slain with the sword well nigh eight thousand men.

86 And from thence Jonathan removed his host, and camped against Ascalon, where the men of the city battle in the neighbourhood of Azotus, not directly under the walls of the town. When the horsemen of Apollonius were "scattered in the field," they "fled to Azotus" (v. 83).

79. in ambush.] Josephus says that they were concealed in the channel of a winter torrent, which is highly probable.

80. Jonathan knew.] How Jonathan discovered the ambush, we are not told. He can scarcely have conjectured its existence from the mere fact, that he was surrounded and harassed with darts from morning till evening. Probably he had information from his scouts, or through deserters from the enemy.

81. the people stood still.] If a retreat had been ordered, the ambush would have risen up in the path of the retreating army, and would most probably have completed its discomfiture. By remaining in the position where he was attacked, and sturdily maintaining his ground, Jonathan rendered the ambush wholly useless.

the enemies' horses were tired.] The horse of Apollonius did not charge, but hovered about the force of Jonathan, and, galloping hither and thither, discharged its arrows at them. Jonathan's troops remaining absolutely on the defensive, in course of time the assailants grew weary. Both horses and men were tired out by their long-continued exertions.

82. Then brought Simon forth his host.] The troops of Simon had, apparently, not been as yet engaged. When the horse of Apollonius, exhausted by its efforts, desisted from the assault, and retired, Simon's force attacked the infantry of the Syrians, which was defeated with ease.

83. The horsemen . . . went into Beth-dagon, their idol's temple.] A temple, as the Greeks understood the term, was a consecrated space, walled round, within which, and occupying only a small part of it, was a sacred building, constituting the sanctuary or shrine. In the open space between the outer wall and the sanctuary, a beaten force not unfrequently took refuge. (See Thucyd. iv. 96, 97; and cf. above, ch. v. 43.) Beth-Dagon, "the house of Dagon," was the native name of the entire consecrated space which was sacred to that deity. Dagon's temple at Ashdod (Azotus) is mentioned in 1 Sam. v. 2–5. (On the position of Dagon in the mythology of Phœnicia, see note in "Speaker's Commentary" on Judg. xvi. 23; and cf. Rawlinson's 'Ancient Religions,' pp. 162–164.)

84. the temple of Dagon, with them that were fled into it, he burned with fire.] As Judas had done with the temple of Ashteroth-Karnaim, and those who sought refuge in it (suprà, ch. v. 44. See the comment on the passage).

86. Jonathan . . . camped against Ascalon.] Ascalon, or Askelon, one of the five cities of the Philistine Pentapolis (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. v. 16–18), appears as a place of importance in the Syrian wars of Rameses II.—the probable Pharaoh of the Israelite oppression—about B.C. 1350. It lay in the tract assigned by Joshua to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 45–47), and was conquered by the men of that tribe soon after Joshua's death (Judg. i. 18), but soon regained its independence (ib. xiv. 19). About the year B.C. 700, it was taken by Sennacherib ('Ancient Monarchies,' vol. ii. p. 431). In the great Scythian invasion of B.C. 630–620, it was occupied by the hordes, who plundered its temple of Astarté, or Atargatis (Herod. i. 105), but otherwise did it no injury. On the return of the Jews from the Captivity, we find it still spoken of as powerful (Zech. ix. 5), and threatened with destruction. It now appears for the first time in the Maccabean wars, and seems to have been a place of no great strength, since it submits at once. The

B. C. cir. 148. came forth, and met him with great pomp.

87 After this returned Jonathan and his host unto Jerusalem, having many spoils.

88 Now when king Alexander heard these things, he honoured Jonathan yet more, 89 And sent him a buckle of gold, as the use is to be given to such as are of the king's blood: he gave him also Accaron with the borders thereof in possession.

CHAPTER XI.

B. C. cir. 146.

12 Ptolemeus taketh away his daughter from Alexander, and entereth upon his kingdom. 17 Alexander is slain, and Ptolemeus dieth within three days. 20 Jonathan besieged the tower at Jerusalem. 26 The Jews and he are much honoured by Demetrius, 48 who is rescued by the Jews from his own subjects in Antioch. 56 Antiochus the younger honoureth Jonathan. 61 His exploits in divers places.

AND the king of Egypt gathered together a great host, like the sand that lieth upon the sea shore, cir. 145.

position of Ascalon, half-way between Ashdod and Gaza, on the Philistine coast, is well ascertained, a small village, which occupies the site, still retaining the name.

89. a buckle of gold.] A buckle or rather a broach (πόρπη, fibula), was commonly used to fasten the cloak, or shawl, which formed the chief outer garment of both Greeks and Orientals, and prevent it from falling off the wearer. The most ordinary place for it was above the right shoulder. Several shapes were employed; but the most common was a flat circular ring with a pin passing across its centre.

as the use is to be given to such as are of the king's blood.] Cf. ch. xi. 58; xiv. 44. The usage here mentioned seems to have been peculiar to the Syrian kings. At least it is not recorded of any others.

he gave him also Accaron.] "Accaron" is the ordinary form used in the Septuagint to express the Hebrew Ekron. This was, like Ascalon, one of the five associated cities of the Philistines. It was the most northern of the five, and the nearest to the Hebrew border. The site is probably identified with that of the modern "Akir," a small village about five miles south-west of Ramleh, and three miles east of Yebna.

in possession.] Grimm suggests that the gift was not a transfer of jurisdiction, but a mere assignment to Jonathan individually, during his lifetime, of the crown revenues of Ekron. He compares Thucyd. i. 138; Corn. Nep. 'Vit. Themist.,' § 10; 2 Macc. iv. 30. But the term used—κληροδοσία—seems to imply a more complete and absolute cession.

CHAPTER XI.

§ 1. EXPEDITION OF PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR INTO SYRIA—HIS CRAFTY PROCEEDINGS, AND DEFEAT OF ALEXANDER — HIS DEATH. DEMETRIUS II. MOUNTS THE THRONE.

1–17. The issue of the war between Alexander Balas and the younger Demetrius was decided by the defection of Ptolemy. The cause of his defection is uncertain. Josephus says that Balas had formed designs against his life ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 4, § 6), and that, on discovering them, Ptolemy changed sides and went over to Demetrius. But our author takes an entirely different view (vv. 10, 11), and he is supported to some extent by Diodorus (Müller's 'Fragmenta Hist. Gr.,' vol. ii. Fr. 19, p. xvi.). Diodorus regards Ptolemy as having entered Syria with the intention of assisting Balas, and as changing his mind on finding that his son-in-law was wholly weak and incapable. Our author thinks that he was false and treacherous from the first (v. 1). But both agree that he invented the charge against Balas as a mere pretext for deserting him. And probability leans this way. Ptolemy seems to have been moved wholly by ambition. He thought that he saw in the weakness of Balas and the distressed state of Syria, an opportunity for his own aggrandizement, and he resolved to take advantage of it. Whether he aimed at annexing all Syria, or only Cœlesyria and Palestine, is perhaps uncertain. He may have aimed originally at the greater design and have ultimately acquiesced in the lesser. But his ambitious schemes, whatever dimensions they may have had, were cut short by his death, which was caused by the wounds received in the great battle in which Balas lost his crown (vv. 15–18). His removal, and that of Balas, by the treachery of an Arab sheikh, left the throne vacant for Demetrius II., who was generally recognised as Syrian king in the year B.C. 146–5.

1. the king of Egypt.] Ptolemy Philometor, who had assisted Balas previously, and given him his daughter in marriage (ch. x. 56–58).

gathered together a great host, like the sand that lieth upon the sea shore.] The author is here poetical beyond his wont. But the phrase was too familiar to the Jews to seem forced or out of place. (See Gen. xxii. 17;

Digitized by Google

B. C. c.r. 146. and many ships, and went about through deceit to get Alexander's kingdom, and join it to his own.

2 Whereupon he took his journey into Syria in peaceable manner, so as they of the cities opened unto him, and met him: for king Alexander had commanded them so to do, because he was his father in law.

3 Now as Ptolemee entered into the cities, he set in every one of them a garrison of soldiers to keep it.

4 And when he came near to Azotus, they shewed him the temple of Dagon that was burnt, and Azotus and the suburbs thereof that were destroyed, and the bodies that were cast abroad, and them that he had burnt in the battle; for they had made heaps of them by the way where he should pass. B. C. cir. 146.

5 Also they told the king whatsoever Jonathan had done, to the intent he might blame him: but the king held his peace.

6 Then Jonathan met the king with great pomp at Joppe, where they saluted one another, and ‖ lodged. ‖ Gr. slept

7 Afterward Jonathan, when he had gone with the king to the river called Eleutherus, returned again to Jerusalem.

8 King Ptolemee therefore, having gotten the dominion of the cities by xxxii. 12; Josh. xi. 4; Judg. vii. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 5; 1 Kings iv. 29.)

many ships.] Egypt was a naval power from a very early date. A sea-fight between the Egyptians and the Tekaru is represented in the sculptures of Rameses III. (See Rosellini, 'Monumenti Storici,' pl. cxxxi.) Neco had two fleets, one in the Red Sea and another in the Mediterranean (Herod. ii. 159). Apries fought at sea with the Tyrians (ib. 161). Egypt furnished 200 triremes to the fleet of Xerxes (ib. vii. 89, § 2). Under the Ptolemies a large navy was maintained (Polyb. v. 34, 35); and even Cleopatra was able to furnish Antony with sixty ships at Actium.

went about through deceit to get Alexander's kingdom.] This is probably a false charge. The writer has a strong bias in favour of Balas, and therefore a strong prejudice against all those who were instrumental in effecting his downfall. Diodorus, who has no feeling either way, says that Ptolemy entered Syria with the full intention of helping Balas (Fr. xix.). So also Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 4, § 5).

2. they of the cities opened unto him.] I.e. admitted him within their walls, with his troops.

and met him.] In friendly fashion, and probably with pomp and display. (Compare ch. x. 86.)

3. Ptolemee . . . set in every one of them a garrison.] The writer sees in this an ill intention; but it would have been quite natural for a friend and ally, whose forces were large (v. 1), to strengthen the garrisons in the various towns through which he passed, in order to secure them against the partisans of the pretender.

4. the temple of Dagon that was burnt.] See above, ch. x. 84. Jonathan's proceedings had been high-handed and harsh, but not beyond what the usages of war were held to justify. The Ashdodites hoped that Ptolemy would regard them as not warranted under the circumstances; but either he thought differently, or else he wished to avoid a rupture with the Jewish leader, who had shewn himself at once an able general and a faithful subject. Hence he took no notice of the Ashdodite complaints (v. 5).

6. Jonathan met the king with great pomp at Joppe.] After reducing Ascalon, Jonathan had returned to Jerusalem (ch. x. 87). It was open to him to have remained there; but no doubt the recognised etiquette of the time and country pointed out as proper the course which he took, namely, that of meeting the Egyptian king, and escorting him as far as he conveniently could. He met him "at Joppe," as the first city towards the south which he could claim as his own, Gaza, Ascalon, and Ashdod being Philistine, and not Judæan.

7. the river called Eleutherus.] The Eleutherus is made by Strabo the boundary between Syria and Palestine (xvi. p. 753). It is mentioned also by Pliny ('H. N.' v. 17) and Ptolemy (v. 15). The former says that it flows from Lebanon and empties itself into the sea between Tripolis and Orthosia. These notices are sufficient to identify it with the modern Nahr-el-Kebir, which has "its highest source at the north-east base of Lebanon," and "sweeps round the northern end of the range," falling into the sea about twenty-five miles north of Tarabulus (Tripolis). "During summer and autumn the Eleutherus is but a small stream, easily forded; but in winter it swells into a large and rapid river" (Porter, in Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible,' vol. i. p. 519).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 146. the sea unto Seleucia upon the sea coast, imagined wicked counsels against Alexander.

9 Whereupon he sent ambassadors unto king Demetrius, saying, Come, let us make a league betwixt us, and I will give thee my daughter whom Alexander hath, and thou shalt reign in thy father's kingdom:

10 For I repent that I gave my daughter unto him, for he sought to slay me.

11 Thus did he slander him, because he was desirous of his kingdom. B. C. cir. 145.

12 Wherefore he took his daughter from him, and gave her to Demetrius, and forsook Alexander, so that their hatred was openly known.

13 Then Ptolemee entered into Antioch, where he set two crowns upon his head, the crown of Asia, and of Egypt.

14 In the mean season was king Alexander in Cilicia, because those

8. Seleucia upon the sea coast.] There were numerous Seleucias. The most important was that built by Seleucus Nicator on the right bank of the Lower Tigris, opposite to which arose the city of Ctesiphon in Parthian times. This was an inland city. There was also an inland Seleucia in Syria on the course of the Orontes. From this the maritime Seleucia—the port of Antioch—is distinguished, as ἡ παραθαλασσία, or ἡ ἐπὶ θαλάττῃ (Polyb. v. 59). It lay some seven or eight miles north of the mouth of the Orontes, at the foot of a lofty mountain known as Mount Coryphæus, and was the second city of Syria Proper during the Seleucid period. The site, which is still known as Selefkiyeh, is marked by some considerable ruins (Chesney, 'Journal of the Royal Geograph. Society,' vol. viii. p. 228 et seqq.).

imagined wicked counsels against Alexander.] It may have been when he was at Seleucia that Ptolemy became convinced of the utter incapacity of Balas (Diod. Sic. Fr. 19), and resolved on a "new departure." Relinquishing the idea of supporting his son-in-law against Demetrius, he made up his mind to come to terms with the latter. To justify his change of sides, he professed to have discovered a plot laid by Balas against his life (infra, v. 10; Diod. Sic. l. s. c.); but of the existence of this plot there is no evidence.

9. he sent ambassadors unto king Demetrius.] Demetrius was probably still in Cilicia, where Balas was confronting him with the chief forces of the empire (see v. 14). Ptolemy could easily communicate with him by sea.

I will give thee my daughter whom Alexander hath.] Divorce for political reasons was common at the time among all the Oriental princes. Ptolemy evidently regarded his daughter as a mere pawn to be played in the political game—to be married, divorced, remarried, perhaps divorced anew, at his pleasure. It is not clear how or when he obtained possession of her—whether at Ptolemaïs, or when he was received into Antioch.

10. he sought to slay me.] It is certain that Ptolemy made this charge against Balas (Diod. Sic. l. s. c.; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 4, § 6); whether justly or not is disputed. Diodorus considered the charge to have been unjust; Josephus admits its truth.

11. Thus did he slander him.] Ἐψόγησεν is not "slandered," but simply "blamed"—"found fault with." Our author does not distinctly state whether he believed the accusation or not.

12. he took his daughter from him, and gave her to Demetrius.] So Livy ('Epit.' lii.) and Diodorus (Fr. xix.).

13. Then Ptolemee entered into Antioch.] Diodorus (l. s. c.) enters into some detail. On quitting Antioch and marching into Cilicia to meet Demetrius, Balas had entrusted affairs to two men, Hierax and Diodotus. These persons, regarding his cause as desperate when Ptolemy declared against him, and being afraid of Demetrius because they had taken part against his father, made the city over to Ptolemy, in the hope that he would accept the government and protect them against both the Syrian princes. Outwardly he acquiesced in their plans, entered the city as Syrian king, and assumed the diadem; but secretly he came to an agreement with Demetrius to resign the crown in his favour, and retain only Cœlesyria and Palestine.

he set two crowns upon his head.] We must not understand this literally. The meaning is, that he accepted a second crown. Being already king of Egypt, he allowed himself to be crowned also as king of Syria. Hence, Polybius gives him the title (xl. 12).

the crown of Asia.] Syria was reckoned the great Asiatic monarchy at this time, the successor of Assyria, Babylon, and Persia. The Seleucidæ, like the Achæmenidæ (Herod. i. 4; iv. 1, 118, 119), claimed to be "lords of Asia." (Compare above, ch. viii. 6.)

14. In the mean season was king Alexander in Cilicia.] Demetrius set himself up for king in Cilicia (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 4,

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 146. that dwelt in those parts had revolted from him.

15 But when Alexander heard of this, he came to war against him: whereupon king Ptolemee brought forth his host, and met him with a mighty power, and put him to flight.

16 So Alexander fled into Arabia, there to be defended; but king Ptolemee was exalted:

17 For Zabdiel the Arabian took off Alexander's head, and sent it unto Ptolemee. B. C. cir. 146.

18 King Ptolemee also died the third day after, ‖and they that were in the strong holds were slain one of another. ‖ Gr. and those that were in the holds were slain of those that were in the holds.

19 By this means Demetrius reigned in the hundred threescore and seventh year.

20 At the same time Jonathan gathered together them that were

§ 3), and was there supported by the bulk of the inhabitants. Balas attacked him in that country, and was still engaged in the struggle when he heard of the movement that had taken place in his rear. Regarding Ptolemy as the more dangerous of his two enemies, he retraced his steps, and marched upon Antioch, near which the battle was fought that cost him his crown (Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, § 16).

16. Alexander fled into Arabia.] Diodorus confirms this. "Alexander," he says, "after his defeat, fled with 500 followers to the place called Abæ in Arabia, to the dynast Diocles, with whom he had previously placed his infant son, Antiochus. Then two of those who had accompanied him, the captains Heliades and Casius, sent a message secretly to Demetrius, promising that, if he would grant them their lives, they would assassinate Alexander. Demetrius agreeing to this, from traitors they became murderers, and put the king to death. Alexander was in this way made away with by his friends" (Fr. xx.).

17. Zabdiel the Arabian took off Alexander's head.] Zabdiel is probably the person whom Diodorus calls "Diocles." The bearing of two names is characteristic of the Maccabee period. If, as is probable, he was privy to the designs and proceedings of Heliades and Casius, the murder might with reason be ascribed to him. His sending Alexander's head to Ptolemy is parallel to the act of those who brought Pompey's head to Julius Cæsar. The intention was to give actual proof of the death to the person chiefly interested.

18. King Ptolemee also died the third day after.] Ptolemy died of an injury received in the battle. His skull was fractured by a fall from his horse, and he was obliged to submit to an operation similar to the modern "trepanning." But either the surgeons were unskilful, or his system could not bear the shock, and he expired under the knife. (See Livy, 'Epit.' lii.)

they that were in the strongholds were slain one of another.] Literally, "those who were in the strongholds were slain by those who were in the strongholds." The meaning seems to be, that the garrisons which Ptolemy had left in the walled cities along the Syrian coast (vv. 3, 9) were massacred by the native inhabitants of the cities.

19. Demetrius reigned in the hundred threescore and seventh year.] The year beginning in October B.C. 146, and terminating in October B.C. 145.

§ 2. JONATHAN, HAVING LAID SIEGE TO THE SYRIAN FORTRESS AT JERUSALEM, IS SUMMONED TO MEET DEMETRIUS AT PTOLEMAÏS—FAVOURABLE RESULT OF THE INTERVIEW.

20–37. On the death of Balas and accession of Demetrius II., who could not but have his hands full under the troubled circumstances of the time, Jonathan thought that he saw an opportunity of quietly relieving Jerusalem of an ever-impending danger, by reducing the fortress which Epiphanes had set up (ch. i. 33–36), and which had sheltered a foreign garrison ever since. He accordingly collected siege artillery, and set himself down before the place (ch. xi. 20). But his enemies were too watchful to allow such an important matter to be carried through without opposition. They at once made representations to Demetrius (v. 21) on the subject, and prevailed on him to summon Jonathan to a conference, where he should give account of his proceedings (v. 22). Jonathan, who trusted much to his address and personal influence, obeyed the summons, and met Demetrius at Ptolemaïs, probably in B.C. 145. Terms of peace were agreed upon. Demetrius confirmed Jonathan in the High Priest's office, "gave him pre-eminence among his chief friends" (v. 27), and consented to most of the remissions previously offered by his father (ch. x. 29–43); but, in return, he required a payment of 300 talents (v. 28), and the continuance of the Syrian garrison in Jerusalem (implied in the subsequent history). The letter containing the terms, after delivery to Jonathan, was to

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 145. in Judea, to take the tower that was in Jerusalem: and he made many engines of war against it.

21 Then certain ungodly persons, who hated their own people, went unto the king, and told him that Jonathan besieged the tower.

22 Whereof when he heard, he was angry, and immediately removing, he came to Ptolemais, and wrote unto Jonathan, that he should not lay siege to the tower, but come and speak with him at Ptolemais in great haste.

23 Nevertheless Jonathan, when he heard this, commanded to besiege it still: and he chose certain of the elders of Israel and the priests, and put himself in peril; B. C. cir. 145.

24 And took silver and gold, and raiment, and divers presents besides, and went to Ptolemais unto the king, where he found favour in his sight.

25 And [a] though certain ungodly men of the people had made complaints against him, [a] ch. 10. 61, &c.

26 Yet the king entreated him as his predecessors had done before, and promoted him in the sight of all his friends, 27 And [b] confirmed him in the high priesthood, and in all the ho- [b] ch. 10. 20. & 14. 38. ver. 57.

be "set in a conspicuous place upon the holy mount" (v. 37).

20. the tower that was in Jerusalem.] See ch. i. 35; iv. 41; vi. 19–26, 32; ix. 53; x. 6–9 and 32.

he made many engines.] "Engines" were commonly made for the occasion of a siege, and probably broken up when the siege was over. They were too cumbersome to be generally kept in store and conveyed from place to place. (See ch. vi. 31, 52; ix. 64; xv. 25.) Still, we hear occasionally of "great provision" of them being laid up in a fortified town (2 Macc. xii. 27).

21. certain ungodly persons.] Literally, "transgressors of the law"—men who had cast off its authority, and desired to Hellenize the nation. (Compare above, ch. ii. 44; iii. 6, &c.; and see the comment on ch. x. 61.)

who hated their own people.] No doubt the feelings of the Hellenizers towards their orthodox brethren were very bitter; but so were those of the orthodox towards them (ch. ii. 44; iii. 5–8; vii. 24, &c.). Neither party "hated their own people." Both sought its advancement, but in different ways.

22. he was angry.] Demetrius I. had "yielded up his authority over the tower," and "given it to the High Priest, that he might set in it such as he should choose to keep it" (ch. x. 32). But this gift had been cancelled by the determination of the Jews to support Balas. Demetrius II., the present king, naturally regarded the citadel of Jerusalem as a part of his dominions, and resented the attack upon it as an act of war against himself.

immediately removing, he came to Ptolemais.] Probably from Antioch. His rapid movement would shew Jonathan that he was in earnest; and his presence at Ptolemaïs, within a hundred miles of Jerusalem, would be something of a menace. At the same time it might be viewed as an act of polite consideration, relieving Jonathan from the necessity of making a longer journey.

23. Jonathan . . . put himself in peril.] No doubt he incurred a considerable risk by going to Ptolemaïs, especially as he had declined to desist from the siege of "the tower." He had confidence, however, in his own adroitness, and in his power of purchasing impunity, and even favour. He may have also calculated that Demetrius would be afraid to exasperate the entire Jewish nation by treacherously arresting their High Priest and king.

24. took silver and gold, and raiment, and divers presents besides.] Intending evidently to procure the favour of others besides the king. Jonathan felt that if he could dispose favourably towards himself the minds of the royal attendants, officers, and ministers, he would be tolerably sure of gaining their master also. Gifts of "raiment" have always been common in the East (Gen. xxiv. 53, xlv. 22; 2 Kings v. 5; 2 Chr. ix. 24, &c.).

26. the king entreated him as his predecessors had done before.] The reference is especially to the treatment which Jonathan had received at the hands of Balas (ch. x. 59–65), but may include also some allusion to the "loving words" of Demetrius I. recorded in ch. x. 3–6. Ptolemy Philometor would scarcely be recognised by Demetrius II. among his "predecessors."

promoted him.] Rather, "exalted him"—i.e. paid him marked respect and honour.

27. confirmed him in the high priesthood.] The same expression is used with respect to Alcimus in ch. vii. 9, where it seems to mean

B. C. cir. 145 nours that he had before, and gave him preeminence among his chief friends.

28 Then Jonathan desired the king, that he would make Judea free from tribute, as also the three governments, with the country of Samaria; and he promised him three hundred talents.

29 So the king consented, and wrote letters unto Jonathan of all these things after this manner:

30 King Demetrius unto his brother Jonathan, and unto the nation of the Jews, sendeth greeting: B. C. cir. 145.

31 We send you here a copy of the letter which we did write unto our cousin Lasthenes concerning you, that ye might see it.

32 King Demetrius unto his father Lasthenes sendeth greeting:

33 We are determined to do good to the people of the Jews, who are our friends, and keep covenants with

"conferred on him the high priesthood;" but here confirmation in the office, rather than appointment to it, is clearly intended. (See the next clause.) Jonathan had been appointed High Priest by Balas (ch. x. 20).

all the honours that he had before.] As the right to wear a crown of gold (ch. x. 20), a buckle of gold (ib. 89), and a purple robe (ib. 20), together with the official titles of "general" and "provincial governor" (ib. 65).

gave him preeminence among his chief friends.] Grimm translates "made (men) regard him as among his chief friends," which is a possible rendering of the original; but the meaning suggested by our translators is a more natural one. The "preeminence" was perhaps confined to the occasion.

28. Then Jonathan desired the king, that he would make Judea free from tribute.] This was a bold proposal. Sovereignty over a subject nation in the East is chiefly marked by payment of tribute, and dominion over foreign races is chiefly sought as a means of increasing the revenue. To ask exemption from tribute was almost equivalent to asking independence. It is true that the king's father, Demetrius I., had promised such exemption (ch. x. 29, 30); but only in an emergency, when the Jews had shewn a preference for his rival, and with the object of outbidding him. Demetrius II. was as yet in no such difficulties. The boldness of Jonathan at this time is thus scarcely diminished by the fact of the elder Demetrius's offer. He had to persuade the Syrian king that the friendship of the Jewish nation was worth a large pecuniary sacrifice. It may be questioned whether he would have succeeded had he not been prepared to offer a considerable immediate payment for the help of the king's necessities.

as also the three governments.] Compare above, ch. x. 30, 38; and below, v. 34.

with the country of Samaria.] A corruption of the text is here suspected. Jonathan would scarcely have stipulated for the exemption from tribute of Samaria, a hostile country, in whose welfare he had no interest. The true reading is probably ἀπὸ τῆς Σαμαρειτίδος, or ἀπὸ τῆς χώρας Σαμαρείας. (See v. 34, and compare ch. x. 38.)

three hundred talents.] About 72,000*l.* of our money.

30. King Demetrius unto his brother Jonathan.] Compare ch. x. 18. The term "brother" corresponded in the diplomacy of the time to the "mon cousin" of modern Europe. It marked admission into the privileged circle of royal personages.

and unto the nation of the Jews.] Compare ch. x. 25. Alexander had addressed Jonathan only; Demetrius I. the Jewish nation only; Demetrius II. addressed the two in combination.

31. our cousin Lasthenes.] It is a reasonable conjecture that this "Lasthenes" is the Cretan who (according to Josephus, 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 4, § 5) collected the troops with which Demetrius II. effected his landing in Cilicia. His services had probably been rewarded by the governorship of Cœlesyria, on which Judæa was to a certain extent dependent. The terms granted to Jonathan had therefore to be communicated to him, and it was sufficient to send the Jews a copy of the communication. The term "cousin" of our version is somewhat too definite, the true correspondent of the Greek συγγενὴς being "kinsman."

that ye might see it.] Rather, "that ye may see it." The clause depends, not on "we did write," but on "we send you here."

32. his father Lasthenes.] Like "kinsman," this is a title of honour. Its application to Lasthenes implies that he was a man of some considerable age. (Compare 2 Kings ii. 12; v. 13; xiii. 14, &c.)

33. keep covenants with us.] Rather, "observe their duties towards us."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 145. us, because of their good will toward us.

34 ‖ Wherefore we have ratified unto them the borders of Judea, with the three governments of Apherema and Lydda and Ramathem, that are added unto Judea from the country of Samaria, and [c] all things appertaining unto them, for all such as do sacrifice in Jerusalem, instead of the payments which the king received of them yearly aforetime out of the fruits of the earth and of trees.

35 And as for other things that belong unto us, of the tithes and customs pertaining unto us, as also [d] the saltpits, and the crown taxes, which are due unto us, we discharge them of them all for their relief.

36 And nothing hereof shall be revoked from this time forth for ever.

37 Now therefore see that thou make a copy of these things, and let it be delivered unto Jonathan, and set upon the holy mount in a conspicuous place.

38 After this, when king Demetrius saw that the land was quiet be-

‖ Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 8.

[c] ch. 10. 42.

B. C. cir. 145.

[d] ch. 10. 29.

There had not as yet been any "covenant" between the Jews and Demetrius II.

because of their good will.] The good will had been shewn by the professions, gifts, and especially the promises of Jonathan (v. 28), whom Demetrius was willing to regard as representing the feelings of his nation.

34. the three governments of Apherema and Lydda and Ramathem.] See the comment on ch. x. 30.

that are added.] Rather, "that were added." The aorist expresses a definite point of past time. (Compare ch. x. 38.)

for all such as do sacrifice in Jerusalem.] A distinction is drawn between those Jews who offered sacrifice at Jerusalem and those who had laid aside the practice. Only the former were to be exempt from the payments commonly exacted by the Syrian kings from their subjects. A strong inducement was thus held out for members of the Hellenizing party to go over to the side of the orthodox, since otherwise they would enjoy none of the new privileges.

instead of the payments, &c.] The syntax is difficult, and Grimm suggests that some word or words must have fallen out. But the general meaning is tolerably clear. Instead of the customary payments to the Syrian crown on account of each of the attached provinces and of Judæa itself, the provinces with their taxation were wholly made over to the Jews themselves, who were no longer to pay anything to their nominal sovereign, the Syrian monarch.

out of the fruits of the earth and of trees.] Compare ch. x. 30, and the comment ad loc.

35. And as for other things.] Rather, "as for the other things"—i.e. all the other heads of revenue.

of the tithes and customs.] See ch. x. 31, which shews that the Syrian crown levied a tax upon the tenths paid by the Jews for the support of the Levitical priesthood, and also upon other "dues" paid to the priestly authorities, e.g. the half shekel for the service of the sanctuary (Neh. x. 32; Matt. xvii. 24–27). Henceforth no claim was to be made by the Syrian crown on either of these two accounts.

the saltpits.] See the comment on ch. x. 29. Shallow ponds, connected with the Dead Sea, into which its water was admitted, and the salt then allowed to form itself by evaporation, are intended. (See Ezek. xlvii. 11; Zeph. ii. 9.)

the crown taxes.] See the comment on ch. x. 29.

37. see that thou make a copy of these things.] The copy here spoken of is not that which Demetrius sent to Jonathan (v. 31) in the form of a letter, written probably on parchment or paper, but one which Lasthenes was to have made, as a permanent memorial, and which was to be set up in a conspicuous place on the Temple mountain. It was probably inscribed, like other "memorials" of the kind (ch. viii. 22), on a bronze tablet.

§ 3. DEMETRIUS OFFENDS HIS NATIVE SOLDIERS — TRYPHO PREPARES TO BRING FORWARD ANTIOCHUS, SON OF BALAS— DEMETRIUS PROMISES JONATHAN TO RECALL THE SYRIAN GARRISONS FROM JUDÆA, IF THE JEWS WILL HELP HIM AGAINST HIS ENEMIES, BUT, THOUGH HELPED, BREAKS HIS PROMISE.

38–53. Demetrius II., after he had reigned a very short time, became unpopular. He is accused by Justin of laziness, by Livy of cruelty (Justin, xxxvi. 1; Liv. 'Epit.' lii.). According to our author, he gave offence by disbanding his Syrian troops, and maintaining an army of foreign mercenaries. The charges may, one and all, be true. That of

B. C. cir. 145. fore him, and that no resistance was made against him, he sent away all his forces, every one to his own place, except certain bands of strangers, whom he had gathered from the isles of the heathen: wherefore all the forces of his fathers hated him.

39 Moreover there was one Tryphon, that had been of Alexander's part afore, who, seeing that all the host murmured against Demetrius, went to Simalcue the Arabian, that brought up Antiochus the young son of Alexander, B. C. cir. 145.

40 And lay sore upon him to deliver him this young Antiochus, that he might reign in his father's stead: he told him therefore all that Demetrius had done, and how his men of war were at enmity with him, and there he remained a long season.

41 In the mean time Jonathan sent unto king Demetrius, that he cruelty is to some extent confirmed by Diodorus, who says he was hated for his lawlessness (Fr. xxi.). The result was a rebellion, which for a time drove Demetrius from his throne (vv. 55, 56). It was while this rebellion was preparing that Jonathan, probably knowing the difficulties that beset Demetrius, made a request for the withdrawal from Judæa of the Syrian garrisons, which was favourably entertained by the Syrian king (v. 42). The king, however, required first to be helped against his enemies, whereupon Jonathan lent him a body of troops, which put down a rising in his capital. Regarding himself as now safe, the king flung his promise to the winds, did not withdraw the garrisons, and "estranged himself" from his recent ally (vv. 43–53).

38. he sent away all his forces . . . except certain bands of strangers.] Josephus is the only writer who confirms this ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 5, § 1); but it is, intrinsically, not improbable. Demetrius had gained his first successes by the swords of his mercenaries (see note on ch. x. 67), and had been opposed by the Syrian levies. He therefore naturally distrusted the latter.

whom he had gathered from the isles of the heathen.] Certainly from Crete (ch. x. 67); possibly from Rhodes, Cyprus, and the islands of the Archipelago.

the forces of his fathers.] I.e. of his predecessors on the Syrian throne.

39. there was one Tryphon.] Tryphon is mentioned by Diodorus (Fr. xxi.), by Appian ('Syriac.' § 68), by Livy ('Epit.' lv.), and by Strabo (xvi. p. 752). His real name was Diodotus, Tryphon being a surname which he adopted after he had made himself king. He was a native of Casiana, a fortified place in the district belonging to the Apamea of Syria. Alexander Balas distinguished him with his favour, and appointed him, conjointly with Hierax, to take the direction of affairs at Antioch, when he marched into Cilicia to meet Demetrius (Diod. Sic. vol. x. p. 73). This trust he abused by admitting Ptolemy Philometor into the city after he had declared against Balas (see the comment on ch. xi. 13). We now find him playing a still bolder game. He conceives the design of bringing forward a pretender to dispute the crown with Demetrius, and ultimately murders his protégé, and makes himself king in his place.

Simalcue the Arabian.] Rather, "Imalcuë." He is called "Malchus" by Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' l. s. c.), and "Jamblichus" by Diodorus (Fr. xxi.). Grimm conjectures that he was the son of the "Diocles," with whom Balas placed Antiochus, when danger first threatened him (Diod. Sic. Fr. xx.). But this is very uncertain. The name is probably a formation from the root melek (Arab. malik), "king."

Antiochus, the young son of Alexander.] Antiochus is said by Diodorus (Fr. xx.) to have been "an infant" (νήπιος) when placed with Diocles. If he was the son of Alexander by Cleopatra (Appian, 'Syriaca,' § 68), who became his wife in B.C. 151, he could not, when Tryphon went to seek him in Arabia (B.C. 145), have been more than five years old. Livy (according to the extant reading) makes him as little as two ('Epit.' lii.); but the reading is with reason questioned, and a probable emendation ("puero" for "bimulo") makes Livy merely say that he was "quite a boy." This is perhaps as much as can be affirmed with certainty.

40. And lay sore upon him.] I.e. "importuned him"—"kept urging him continually."

there he remained a long season.] Literally, "many days." Probably not more is intended than a stay of some weeks.

41. In the mean time Jonathan sent unto king Demetrius.] Demetrius's difficulty was Jonathan's opportunity. Affairs in Syria having reached the condition described in vv. 38–40, Jonathan thought the time was come when the Syrian king would be prepared to pay a considerable price for the Jewish alliance. He therefore made the proposal would cast those of the tower out of Jerusalem, and those also in the fortresses: for they fought against Israel.

Digitized by Microsoft®

42 So Demetrius sent unto Jonathan, saying, I will not only do this for thee and thy people, but I will greatly honour thee and thy nation, if opportunity serve.

43 Now therefore thou shalt do well, if thou send me men to help me; for all my forces are gone from me.

44 Upon this Jonathan sent him three thousand strong men unto Antioch: and when they came to the king, the king was very glad of their coming.

45 Howbeit they that were of the city gathered themselves together into the midst of the city, to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand men, and would have slain the king.

46 Wherefore the king fled into the court, but they of the city kept the passages of the city, and began to fight.

47 Then the king called to the Jews for help, who came unto him

B. C. cir. 145.

B. C. cir. 145.

recorded in this verse. No doubt, he gave it to be understood that, if his request were granted, Demetrius would receive a quid pro quo.

that he would cast those of the tower out of Jerusalem.] Cause, that is, the Syrian fortress in Jerusalem (Acra) to be evacuated.

and those also in the fortresses.] Bacchides had established Syrian garrisons in Jericho, Emmaus, Beth-horon, Bethel, Thamnatha-Pharathoni, Tephon, Beth-shur, and Gazara (ch. ix. 50–52). At the commencement of the war between Balas and Demetrius I., most of these places were evacuated (ch. x. 12, 13). Beth-shur, however, was not yielded (ib. v. 14), and probably others of the cities named were re-occupied. Jonathan asked that the garrisons should, one and all, be withdrawn.

they fought against Israel.] The main object of garrisoning the Jewish town was to afford a support to the Hellenizing Jews. It is not probable that the garrisons came often into collision with the patriots; but they were felt to be a hostile force ranged on the side of the opposite party.

42. I will not only do this for thee, &c.] Demetrius was prompt to promise, since he did not regard any promise as binding. He "dissembled in all that ever he spake" (v. 53). His short-sighted policy led him to tide over each difficulty, as it arose, by giving pledges which it was not his intention to redeem. The result was that his difficulties continually increased upon him. Probably a real honest alliance with Jonathan would have been more for his true interest than any other course. But he was not clear-sighted enough to see this. He supposed that political advantage was only to be gained by treachery and intrigue.

I will greatly honour thee and thy nation.] Literally, "Glorifying I will glorify thee." Cf. ch. xiv. 29, 39; xv. 9. The idiom is a common one in Hebrew (Gen. iii. 16; xxii. 17, &c.).

44. three thousand strong men.] This seems a weak contingent under the circumstances, and one from which no very important service could be expected. But even a small body of trained soldiers is of value against a city rabble, which was what Demetrius had chiefly to fear. His troops had been disbanded, and sent away to their homes (v. 38). It was the populace of Antioch that especially threatened disturbances—a populace very fickle, very unruly, and very cowardly. By "strong men" is meant "good soldiers, brave and experienced."

45. they that were of the city gathered themselves together.] This revolt, or riot, is not mentioned by the classical writers, whose notices of the reign of Demetrius II. are few and scanty. It is, however, quite in accord with the general character of the Antiochene populace.

to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand men.] The population of Antioch is said to have amounted to 400,000; so that a riot in which 120,000 men took part would be quite possible.

46. the king fled into the court.] I.e. "into the palace." The rioters chose a time when he was outside the palace walls, hoping no doubt to seize his person; but in this intention they were baulked. Demetrius succeeded in escaping from them, and shutting himself up within the royal residence, which was a defensible position.

the passages.] The main "thoroughfares" of the city seem to be intended—those especially which led from the palace to the city gates. The object was to prevent the escape of the king.

47. the king called to the Jews for help.]

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 145. all at once, and dispersing themselves through the city slew that day in the city to the number of an hundred thousand.

48 Also they set fire on the city, and gat many spoils that day, and delivered the king.

49 So when they of the city saw that the Jews had got the city as they would, their courage was abated: wherefore they made supplication to the king, and cried, saying,

‖ Or, Be friends with us. 50 ‖Grant us peace, and let the Jews cease from assaulting us and the city.

51 With that they cast away their weapons, and made peace; and the Jews were honoured in the sight of the king, and in the sight of all that were in his realm; and they returned to Jerusalem, having great spoils. B. C. cir. 145.

52 So king Demetrius sat on the throne of his kingdom, and the land was quiet before him.

53 Nevertheless he dissembled in all that ever he spake, and estranged himself from Jonathan, neither rewarded he him according to the benefits which he had received of him, but troubled him very sore.

Josephus says, that Demetrius called to his aid "the Jews sent by Jonathan, and his own mercenaries" ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 5, § 3), which is probable. The latter, no doubt, amounted to some thousands (see v. 38). Together, they effected a great slaughter of the rioters; but we may be excused from believing that the slain were really 100,000. The estimate is manifestly one of the roughest kind; and we may detect in it the usual Oriental exaggeration.

48. Also they set fire on the city.] Perhaps not intentionally. In every great disturbance within an Oriental town, where the buildings are chiefly of wood, there is much danger of an accidental conflagration.

gat many spoils.] They had probably the king's permission to plunder, not only the persons, but the houses, of the rioters.

49. their courage was abated.] Literally, "they fainted in their spirits." (Cf. Is. vii. 4; where the LXX. have nearly the same expression.)

51. they cast away their weapons.] The rabble of Antioch was not an unarmed rabble. In the East almost every man carries some weapon or other, life being so insecure that it is necessary to have the means of defending it. The expression "cast away their arms" seems to imply, not so much a formal surrender, as a tumultuary movement, in which each strove to rid himself of the incumbrance of armour and weapons.

the Jews were honoured.] Rather, "glorified." The entire series of events was honourable to the Jews; and all faithful subjects of the Syrian king naturally gave them praise and glory. They had risked their lives in defence of the monarch—they had fought against enormous odds—they had carried all before them. Their exertions had saved the king's life (v. 48). Faithful subjects could not but give honour and glory to those who had so acted.

52. the land was quiet before him.] Cf. the opening clause of v. 38. Again, it must be understood that the tranquillity was of very short duration. Tryphon came forward as the champion of the young Antiochus before the close of the 168th Seleucid year, which began in October B.C. 145, and ended in October B.C. 144. Probably he was only absent a few months in Arabia, and proclaimed his protégé before the year B.C. 145 was ended. (See Clinton, 'Fasti Hellenici,' vol. iii. p. 327.)

53. he dissembled in all that ever he spake.] Rather, "he gave the lie to all his professions"—that is, all those that he had made to Jonathan (vv. 42, 43).

but troubled him very sore.] Josephus says that Demetrius threatened Jonathan with war, unless all the payments were made regularly, which had been customary under the early Syrian kings. This, if true, was a revocation of the terms granted by his letter (vv. 32–36), which had been set up by his orders in a conspicuous place upon the holy mount (v. 37). Nothing could be a more palpable breach of faith.

§ 4. TRYPHON BRINGS FORWARD ANTIOCHUS, SON OF BALAS, AND SEATS HIM UPON THE THRONE — FRIENDLY RELATIONS ESTABLISHED BETWEEN THE NEW KING AND THE JEWS.

54–59. Tryphon found some difficulty in persuading the Arab chief (v. 39) to entrust Antiochus to his care; but his importunity prevailed after a time. Antiochus was proclaimed king in B.C. 145–4, and given the names of "Epiphanes" and "Dionysus." He could not have been more than five or six years old at the time. The disbanded sol-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144.

54 After this returned Tryphon, and with him the young child Antiochus, who reigned, and was crowned.

55 Then there gathered unto him all the men of war, whom Demetrius had put away, and they fought against Demetrius, who turned his back and fled.

56 Moreover Tryphon took the ‖elephants, and won Antioch.

‖ Gr. beasts.

57 At that time young Antiochus wrote unto Jonathan, saying, I confirm thee in the high priesthood, and appoint thee ruler over the four governments, and to be one of the king's friends.

B. C. cir. 144

58 Upon this he sent him golden vessels ‖to be served in, and gave him leave to drink in gold, and to be clothed in purple, and to wear a golden buckle.

‖ Gr. and service.

diers of Demetrius embraced his cause with ardour, and flocked to the standard of Tryphon, who marched upon Antioch, met Demetrius in the field and defeated him, captured his elephants, and became master of the capital (vv. 55, 56). Tryphon, upon this, caused letters to be written to Jonathan in the name of the boy-king, confirming him in the High Priesthood, and granting him various privileges (vv. 57, 58). At the same time, he conferred on Simon, Jonathan's brother, a military command extending from "the ladder of Tyre" to the borders of Egypt (v. 59).

54. the young child Antiochus.] See the comment on v. 39.

who reigned and was crowned.] Literally, "who reigned and assumed the diadem." The fact of the reign is proved by coins, which extend from the 168th Seleucid year to the 170th. It is allowed by Appian ('Syriaca,' § 68) and Diodorus (Fr. xxi.). Porphyry, on the other hand, omits it (ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, p. 194). Of course the boy-king was a mere puppet in the hands of Tryphon, as Eupator was in those of Lysias (supra, ch. vi. 17, 63).

55. there gathered unto him all the men of war whom Demetrius had put away.] See above, v. 38. Diodorus tells us that Tryphon had at first only a small force, with which he took up a position near Chalcis, on the borders of Arabia. Demetrius despised him as a mere robber-chief, and ordered his arrest, but sent no expedition against him. Tryphon, thus left to himself, largely increased his troops, the discontented flocking to him from all quarters, so that Demetrius was compelled to regard him as a serious rival (Fr. xxi.).

they fought against Demetrius, who turned his back and fled.] The defeat of Demetrius by Tryphon is confirmed by Livy ('Epit.' lii.), who says that after the battle he fled to Seleucia. No description of the battle has come down to us.

56. Tryphon took the elephants.] Literally, "the beasts;" but no doubt elephants are meant. Though by the treaty of Magnesia the Syrian monarchs were to cease to maintain any war-elephants, they undoubtedly continued to do so. Antiochus Eupator had at least twenty-two (see the comment on ch. vi. 30). Demetrius is likely to have maintained at least as large a number.

and won Antioch.] The occupation of Antioch by Tryphon follows naturally from the retreat of Demetrius to Seleucia, attested by Livy ('Epit.' lii.). It has also the witness of Porphyry (ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, § 17).

57. young Antiochus wrote unto Jonathan.] The letter was, no doubt, written in the name of the young prince, but really emanated from Tryphon. (Compare ch. vi. 57–61.)

I confirm thee in the high priesthood.] Compare ch. x. 20; xi. 27.

and appoint thee ruler over the four governments.] The "four governments" are Judæa, Aphærema, Lydda, and Ramathaim. See v. 34.

one of the king's friends.] See above, ch. x. 20, 65; ch. xi. 27.

58. he sent him golden vessels to be served in.] Literally, "golden vessels and service"—an instance of hendiadys. Our translation gives the true sense. Gifts of golden vessels, or ornaments, by kings to those whom they delighted to honour were common in the East from very ancient times. An Egyptian of the age of Thothmes III. (B.C. 1600) boasts that Amenophis I. had given him "two golden armlets, a bracelet, a sword, and a crown inlaid with gems;" Thothmes I., "two golden armlets, four collars, a bracelet, a sword, and two golden war-axes;" and Thothmes II., "two gold armlets, six collars, three bracelets, and a war axe of silver" ('Records of the Past,' vol. iv. p. 8). The Persian practice is abundantly witnessed to by Xenophon ('Cyrop.' viii. 3, § 35; 'Anab.' i. 2, § 27, &c.) and others. The Syro-Macedonians adopted the usage from the Persians.

gave him leave to drink in gold.] Com-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. 59 His brother Simon also he made captain from the place called The ladder of Tyrus unto the borders of Egypt.

60 Then Jonathan ‖ went forth, and passed through the cities beyond the water, and all the forces of Syria gathered themselves unto him for to help him: and when he came to Ascalon, they of the city met him honourably.

B. C. cir. 144.

61 From whence he went to Gaza,

‖ Or, went beyond the river, and passed through the cities, or, went and passed beyond the river and through the cities, Gr.

pare 1 Esdras iii. 6. It may be doubted whether such permission was ever practically necessary, but it may have been a piece of court etiquette to grant it. So with ourselves, the Crown grants permission to a man to assume a name, which he can assume with equal ease apart from any such permission.

and to be clothed in purple.] See the comment on ch. x. 20.

and to wear a golden buckle.] Compare ch. x. 89, with the comment ad loc.

59. His brother Simon.] Simon had greatly distinguished himself in the war which Jonathan waged, on behalf of Alexander Balas, against Apollonius, the general of Demetrius (ch. x. 74–82), and seemed therefore to deserve special honour at the hands of Alexander's son.

the place called The ladder of Tyrus.] According to Josephus ('Bell. Jud.' ii. 10, § 2), "the ladder of Tyre" was a high mountain on the Syrian coast, 100 stades north of Ptolemaïs, or Acre. A lofty headland, the Ras-en-Nakhurah, which descends sheer into the sea, and effectually cuts off the Bay of Acre from the maritime plain to the north, is found in this position, and is generally regarded by modern travellers (Stanley, Porter, Robinson, &c.) as the "ladder" in question. It is surmounted by a path cut in zigzags, and exceedingly steep. Dean Stanley notes that it forms "the natural barrier between Phœnicia and Palestine" ('Sinai and Palestine,' p. 264).

the borders of Egypt.] The Wady-el-Arish (or "Torrens Ægypti") was commonly regarded as forming the southern boundary of Palestine and separating it from Egypt. Simon's authority over the tract within the limits named is somewhat doubtful. It certainly did not supersede that of his brother.

§ 5. Campaign of Jonathan on behalf of Antiochus VI.—Submission of Ascalon and Gaza—Battle of Kadesh.

60–74. Embracing with ardour the cause of the young king, Jonathan busied himself in bringing all Palestine, and Syria as far as Damascus, under his rule. He seems to have first received the submission of the Trans-Jordanic region (v. 60), after which he visited Philistia, occupied Ascalon, and besieged Gaza, which was forced to submit (vv. 61, 62). Hence he marched northward to Damascus, suppressing resistance on his way, and establishing everywhere the authority of the son of Balas. Meanwhile Demetrius had recovered from his first defeat, and recommenced the struggle for the Syrian crown. His generals proceeded against Palestine, which they entered on the north by way of Kedesh and Hazor. Jonathan met them near the site of the latter city, and a battle was fought, in which he narrowly escaped defeat and destruction, but ultimately retrieved the day by the help of two of his officers (v. 70), and gained a complete victory (vv. 73, 74). Meanwhile Simon, who had been left behind in Judæa, besieged Beth-zur, and forced it to surrender (vv. 65, 66).

60. beyond the water.] Rather, "beyond the river." "The river" here can only be the Jordan. Jonathan began with a progress through the Trans-Jordanic region, already well known to him from the expedition of Judas in B.C. 164 (ch. v. 24–52), which he accompanied, and from his own raid in B.C. 160 (ch. ix. 37–48).

all the forces of Syria.] The Syrian garrisons in Judæa are probably intended. They had embraced the cause of Antiochus, and were ready to give Jonathan all the help in their power. The main force of the empire, divided between Demetrius and Tryphon, carried on the civil war in the neighbourhood of Antioch.

when he came to Ascalon.] The transition is abrupt, and can only be excused by the author's desire of studying brevity. After arranging matters in the country east of the Jordan, Jonathan must have returned into Judæa proper, and commenced a second progress through Philistia, where he suspected disaffection. Ascalon, the first town which he visited, received him readily, being quite willing to acknowledge Antiochus as king.

61. From whence he went to Gaza.] Gaza was the most southern of the five cities forming the Philistine Pentapolis. It lay at the distance of twenty stades (2¼ miles) from the sea, about fifteen miles south-west of Ascalon. With the exception of Ashdod, it was the strongest of the cities; and its position but they of Gaza shut him out; wherefore he laid siege unto it, and burned ‖ the suburbs thereof with fire, and spoiled them.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144

‖ Or, the places thereabout.

62 Afterward, when they of Gaza made supplication unto Jonathan, ‖ he made peace with them, and took the sons of their chief men for hostages, and sent them to Jerusalem, and passed through the country unto Damascus.

‖ Gr. he gave them the right hand.

B. C. cir. 144.

63 Now when Jonathan heard that Demetrius' princes were come to Cades, which is in Galilee, with a great power, purposing ‖ to remove him out of the country,

‖ Or, to remove him from the affairs of the kingdom.

64 He went to meet them, and left Simon his brother in the country.

65 Then Simon encamped against Bethsura, and fought against it a long season, and shut it up:

gave it an importance beyond that which could be claimed even by Ashdod. It was the key of Syria on the one hand and of Egypt on the other. The ancient Egyptian Pharaohs had to occupy it before they could safely conduct any expedition into Asia; and hence it is frequently mentioned in the early hieroglyphical inscriptions, where it is called "Gazatu" ('Records of the Past,' vol. ii. pp. 38, 115, &c.). The Assyrian conquerors were equally bound to make themselves masters of it before they could invade Egypt; and hence we find accounts of its siege and capture in the inscriptions of the Sargonidæ. Sargon himself took it about B.C. 720, after defeating Khanun, its king. Asshur-bani-pal marched through it on his way to Egypt, and received the submission of its king (G. Smith, 'Assurbanipal,' pp. 18, 31). It is probably the "Cadytis" which was taken by Pharaoh-Necho (Herod. ii. 159). Cambyses made himself master of it before he entered Egypt (Pomp. Mel. i. 11); and Alexander the Great was detained before it for five months (Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.' ii. 26, 27). It is now "Ghuzzeh," a town of 16,000 inhabitants, on the verge of the desert which separates Egypt from Palestine.

they of Gaza shut him out.] Trusting, no doubt, in the strength of the position and the defences.

burned the suburbs.] As he had formerly burned those of Azotus (supra, v. 4).

62. he . . . took the sons of their chief men for hostages.] Compare ch. ix. 53, where Bacchides is represented as acting similarly. It marks the semi-independence of Jonathan, that he retained the hostages in his own power, and did not hand them over to Tryphon.

passed through the country unto Damascus.] Damascus was far beyond the limits of Jonathan's proper territory; but in his zeal to serve the cause of Antiochus he pushed his conquests as far north as this ancient town, which had once been the capital of Syria.

63. Demetrius' princes.] Literally, "Demetrius' rulers"—i.e. his generals.

Cades, which is in Galilee.] There were at least four cities of the name of Kadesh (= "Holy"), or Kedesh, one at the extreme south of Judah, known as Kadesh-Barnea (Num. xxxii. 8; Josh. x. 41); another in Issachar (Josh. xii. 22; 1 Chr. vi. 72); a third in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 37; Judg. iv. 6); and a fourth in the Orontes valley, the scene of the famous battle between Rameses II. and the Hittites ('Records of the Past,' vol. ii. pp. 67–78). The only one of these that was "in Galilee" is the Naphtalite town, which was in the hilly region north-west of the Lake of Merom, not far from Hazor (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 5, § 6; 'Bell. Jud.' ii. 18, § 1; iv. 2, § 3). It was the home of Barak, the son of Abinoam (Judg. l. s. c.), in the early days of the Judges, and was taken by Tiglath-Pileser in his first campaign against Israel (2 Kings xv. 29). The site is almost certainly that occupied by the modern "Kedes," four miles from the north-west corner of Lake Merom in a north-westerly direction (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. iii. p. 366).

purposing to remove him out of the country.] Rather, "purposing to remove him from his office." As Ewald remarks ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 331, note [5]), "office" or "public occupation" is a common meaning of χρεία (ch. xiii. 15, 37). Polybius has almost the exact phrase here used for "removing from office" ('Hist.' iv. 87, § 9).

64. He went to meet them, and left Simon.] Jonathan had probably returned from Damascus to Jerusalem before he heard of the attack on his northern frontier. Resolving to go in person and fight his antagonists, he "left Simon" as his representative, in Judæa.

65. Simon encamped against Bethsura.] Bethsura (Beth-zur) was taken by the Syrians in the reign of Eupator (ch. vi. 50), and strongly garrisoned. The fortifications were strengthened by the elder Demetrius (ch. ix. 52). When the fortresses generally were evacuated by the Syrian garrisons at the commencement of the war between Demetrius and Balas (ch. x. 12), Bethsura formed an exception (ib. v. 13). It was no doubt one

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 144. 66 But they desired to have peace with him, which he granted them, and then put them out from thence, and took the city, and set a garrison in it.

67 As for Jonathan and his host, they pitched at the water of Gennesar, from whence betimes in the morning they gat them to the plain of Nasor.

68 And, behold, the host of strangers met them in the plain, who, having laid men in ambush for him in the mountains, came themselves over against him. B. C. cir. 143.

69 So when they that lay in ambush rose out of their places, and joined battle, all that were of Jonathan's side fled;

70 Insomuch as there was not one of them left, except Mattathias the son of Absalom, and Judas the son of Calphi, the captains of the host.

of the places from which Jonathan had requested the younger Demetrius to withdraw his forces (ch. xi. 41), and which he had promised to evacuate (ib. v. 42). But this promise had remained a dead letter (v. 53). Under these circumstances it was resolved that an effort should be made by Simon to expel the garrison by force.

shut it up.] I.e. strictly blockaded it. The defences were, probably, so strong that it could only be reduced in this way.

67. the water of Gennesar.] Undoubtedly the "Sea of Galilee" or "Lake of Gennesareth." We have here for the first time, the name in a form from which "Gennesaret" would be an easy derivation. In the earlier Scriptures the lake has been called "the Sea of Chinnereth" (Num. xxxiv. 11; Deut. iii. 17), from a town in its neighbourhood (Josh. xix. 35). Etymological laws do not allow of Chinnereth having become Gennesar, and it is therefore best to suppose an entirely distinct origin for the latter name. It appears to have belonged primarily to the fertile tract at the north-western angle of the lake, which was called "the land of Gennesaret" (Matt. xiv. 34), and was a "garden" (gannah), perhaps a "garden of princes" (gannath sarim) at some ancient date. Or, sar may be the residuum of a proper name. The water of Gennesaret, so seldom mentioned in the Old Scriptures, obtains a position of high honour in the New, and to the Christian is inseparably associated with the life, teaching, and miracles of his Lord.

they gat them to the plain of Nasor.] Several MSS. have "Asor" for "Nasor;" and so Josephus, and the Syriac and Vulgate translations. The initial ν has probably been repeated from the terminal ν of the preceding word (πεδίον). "Asor" is, in all probability, Hazor, for which it stands throughout the Septuagint Version. Hazor was one of the most ancient cities of Palestine. It is first found as the capital of the elder Jabin (Josh. xi. 1), and after Jabin's defeat by Joshua it fell into the hands of the latter (ib. v. 10), who destroyed it by fire (ib. v. 11). It seems, however, to have been soon rebuilt, for it is mentioned among the "fenced cities" assigned to Naphtali (ib. xix. 36). Early in the period of the Judges it is once more Canaanite, and a second Jabin reigns there (Judg. iv. 2), who oppresses Israel, and contends with Deborah and Barak. Solomon made it one of his fortified posts (1 Kings ix. 15); and Tiglath-Pileser seized it on his first expedition against Israel (2 Kings xvi. 29). The site of Hazor is not yet satisfactorily identified. Capt. Conder places it at Hadireh (Map, Sheet IV.), fourteen miles west of Merom; but the position suggested by Robinson ('Researches,' vol. iii. pp. 364–5), on a hill, immediately above the lake, seems preferable. "The plain of Asor" would in that case be the tract lying north-west of this site, between Tel-el-Khuraibeh and Kedes.

68. the host of strangers.] Grimm supposes the "strangers" of v. 38 to be meant, but the word in the original is different. Probably ἀλλόφυλοι is merely used, as in ch. iv. 12, 26, 30, for the more common ἀλλότριοι, in the sense of "foreigners."

69. all that were of Jonathan's side fled.] This is an evident exaggeration. Josephus softens the tale, and reduces it to the level of the possible, by saying ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 5, § 4) that "all fled except about fifty men," who remained with Mattathias and Judas; but it may be doubted whether he had any authority for his statement.

70. Mattathias the son of Absalom, and Judas the son of Calphi.] That these chiefs especially distinguished themselves in the battle cannot be doubted. Otherwise their names would not have been placed on record with such particularity. Probably they restrained their immediate followers from flight, when the panic seized the rest of the army, and so enabled Jonathan to restore the battle. Our author does not say (as

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144.

71 Then Jonathan rent his clothes, and cast earth upon his head, and prayed.

72 Afterwards turning again to battle, he put them to flight, and so they ran away.

73 Now when his own men that were fled saw this, they turned again unto him, and with him pursued them to Cades, even unto their own tents, and there they camped.

74 So there were slain of the heathen that day about three thousand men: but Jonathan returned to Jerusalem.

CHAPTER XII.

B. C. cir. 144.

1 Jonathan reneweth his league with the Romans and Lacedemonians. 28 The forces of Demetrius, thinking to surprise Jonathan, flee away for fear. 35 Jonathan fortifieth the castles in Judea, 48 and is shut up by the fraud of Tryphon in Ptolemais.

NOW when Jonathan saw that the time served him, he chose certain men, and sent them to Rome, [a] for to confirm and renew the friendship that they had with them. [a] ch. 8. 1, 20.

2 He sent letters also to the Lacedemonians, and to other places, for the same purpose.

3 So they went unto Rome, and Josephus does) that they were "the captains of the host," but only that they were "captains" (ἄρχοντες, not οἱ ἄρχοντες).

71. Jonathan rent his clothes, and cast earth upon his head.] Possible actions in an Oriental under such circumstances, though so contrary to the manner of the West. (Compare above, ch. iv. 39; and see Herod. iii. 66, viii. 99, ix. 34, &c.)

and prayed.] Compare the prayers of Judas (ch. iv. 10, 30–33).

73. pursued them to Cades.] Kedes is about 2½ miles north-west of the supposed site of Hazor (see the comment on v. 67), and would naturally serve as a refuge to the fugitives.

even unto their own tents.] Rather, "their own camp." See v. 63.

74. there were slain of the heathen . . about three thousand men.] Josephus, with unusual moderation, reduces the number of the slain to two thousand.

CHAPTER XII.

§ 1. JONATHAN SENDS EMBASSIES TO ROME AND SPARTA—REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY HIS AMBASSADORS.

1–23. It is not very clear what advantage Jonathan expected to derive from an interchange of compliments with Rome and Sparta. Perhaps the object was merely to assert his own rank and dignity as a sovereign prince, semi-independent at any rate. Possibly, however, his recognition as an ally by the Romans may have helped to encourage those who were disposed to be friendly to him, and have tended to alarm his enemies. It seems certain that he sought no material aid in either quarter. His ambassadors were sent with complimentary messages only. They started in the winter of B.C. 145–144, but did not return until after his death in the last-named year. The embassy to Rome was in continuation of the friendly relations established by Judas (ch. viii. 1–32); that to Sparta stood connected with an earlier effort of the same kind made in the reign of the Spartan king Areus, who ascended the throne in B.C. 309, and held it till B.C. 265.

1. when Jonathan saw that the time served him.] I.e. "was convenient," either because there was nothing more important to occupy his attention, or because the situation of affairs seemed to favour some fresh diplomatic efforts.

he chose certain men.] For the names of the men selected see v. 16, and compare ch. xiv. 22.

for to confirm and renew the friendship that they had with them.] See ch. viii. 1–32. Judas in his last days had been induced to seek the moral support of the Roman alliance. It no doubt added to his prestige, and may even have been of some material value, by determining the attitude of powers which took an active part in the contest for political predominance that was going on at the time.

2. He sent letters also to the Lacedemonians.] Literally, "to the Spartans;" and so throughout the chapter. The Spartans, or people of the capital, Sparta, had alone in the ancient times exercised political power. Hence, even in the later times, when a tyranny had been established, the entire people were as often called Spartans as Lacedæmonians.

to other places.] As, perhaps, Pergamus, between which and Judæa there were friendly relations (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiv. 10, § 22).

3. they . . . entered into the senate.] See the comment on ch. viii. 19.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. entered into the senate, and said, Jonathan the high priest, and the people of the Jews, sent us unto you, to the end ye should renew the friendship, which ye had with them, and league, as in former time.

4 Upon this the Romans gave them letters unto the governors of every place, that they should bring them into the land of Judea peaceably.

5 And this is the copy of the letters which Jonathan wrote to the Lacedemonians:

6 Jonathan the high priest, and the elders of the nation, and the priests, and the other people of the Jews, unto the Lacedemonians their brethren send greeting:

7 There were letters sent in times past unto Onias the high priest from ‖ Darius, who reigned then among you, to signify that ye are our brethren, as the copy here underwritten doth specify.

B. C. cir. 144.

‖ Areus: See Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 8.

8 At which time Onias entreated the ambassador that was sent honourably, and received the letters, wherein declaration was made of the ‖ league and friendship.

‖ Or, kindred, Joseph. Antiq.

9 Therefore we also, albeit we need none of these things, for that we have the holy books of scripture in our hands to comfort us,

10 Have nevertheless attempted to send unto you for the renewing of brotherhood and friendship, lest to the end ye should renew the friendship.] Such "renewals" were frequent in antiquity, even where there had been no rupture of friendship. They were regarded as specially appropriate when a new sovereign had ascended the throne (see Polyb. iv. 26, § 8; vii. 3, § 1; xi. 34, § 11; xxiii. 1, § 5; xxviii. 1, § 9; xxxiii. 16, § 2).

as in former time.] Compare ch. viii. 21–32.

4. the Romans gave them letters.] Apparently Rome hesitated to commit herself, perhaps doubting how the contest would go between Tryphon and Demetrius. She could not do less than what she did—i.e. grant the ambassadors a safe conduct through her dominions on their return.

5. this is the copy of the letters.] Rather, "of the letter." The plural ἐπιστολαὶ is used for a single letter in Greek (Thucyd. i. 132), as litteræ in Latin. Cf. ch. x. 17; xi. 29; xii. 19; xiv. 20; xv. 1. Our version gives the correct translation in ch. x. 17.

6. the elders of the nation.] Literally, "the senate." According to the author of the Second Book, the Jews had a recognized "senate" in the time of Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc. xi. 27) and even in that of Epiphanes (ch. iv. 44); but this is the first mention of such an institution by the author of the First Book. Grimm conjectures that the institution really originated in the time of Jonathan; but of this there can scarcely be said to be any evidence. Probably the "senate" of Maccabean times was the same body with the Herodian "sanhedrin" (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiv. 9, § 4).

their brethren.] See below, v. 21, where the supposed connection, and the grounds of it, will be considered.

7. There were letters sent in times past unto Onias the high priest from Darius.] For "Darius" we must certainly read "Areus," as in v. 20. Areus, grandson of Cleomenes II., succeeded his grandfather as King of Sparta in B.C. 309, and had a reign of forty-four years (Diod. Sic. xx. 29), dying B.C. 265. He was contemporary with the Jewish High Priest, Onias I., successor of Jaddua, for nine years—from B.C. 309 to B.C. 300. Sparta was greatly depressed at this time, crushed under the yoke of Alexander's "successors," and may well have sought to strengthen herself even by so humble an alliance as one with the Jews of the time, who were dependants upon Egypt.

8. the letters.] Rather, "the letter." See the comment on v. 5.

wherein declaration was made of the league and friendship.] Rather, "of alliance and friendship." For the "declaration" itself, see v. 23.

9. albeit we need none of these things.] I.e. "neither alliance nor friendship." The boast is strange, since "alliance and friendship" were being sought; but the very strangeness is in favour of the genuineness of the passage. The Jews always felt themselves to be a favoured nation, and entered into diplomatic relations with other countries, as it were, under protest, and with the feeling that they were conferring, not receiving, a benefit.

for that we have the holy books of scripture in our hands.] The words "of scripture" are added by our translators, and should be in italics.

10. for the renewing of brotherhood.] I.e. "of the acknowledgment of brotherhood." (See vv. 6, 7, 21.) The brotherhood itself

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. we should become strangers unto you altogether: for there is a long time passed since ye sent unto us.

11 We therefore at all times without ceasing, both in our feasts, and other convenient days, do remember you in the sacrifices which we offer, and in our prayers, as reason is, and as it becometh us to think upon our brethren:

12 And we are right glad of your honour.

13 As for ourselves, we have had great troubles and wars on every side, forsomuch as the kings that are round about us have fought against us.

14 Howbeit we would not be troublesome unto you, nor to others of our confederates and friends, in these wars:

15 For we have help from heaven that succoureth us, so as we are delivered from our enemies, and our enemies are brought under foot. B. C. cir. 144.

16 For this cause we chose Numenius the son of Antiochus, and Antipater the son of Jason, and sent them unto the Romans, to renew the amity that we had with them, and the former league.

17 We commanded them also to go unto you, and to salute you, and to deliver you our letters concerning the renewing of our brotherhood.

18 Wherefore now ye shall do well to give us an answer thereto.

19 And this is the copy of the letters ‖ which Oniares sent. ‖ Read out of Joseph. which Areus sent to Onias.

20 Areus king of the Lacedemo-was a (supposed) fact, which might be acknowledged or disputed, but which it was impossible to "renew."

there is a long time passed since ye sent unto us.] No less a time than 155 years, or from that to 164 years. If the alliance was to be kept up, it was certainly high time that some further demonstration should be made. The advantage, however, of a sentimental friendship between states so distant, and so isolated one from the other, as Sparta and Judæa, is more than doubtful.

11. our feasts.] The Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles, Dedication, and Purim.

other convenient days.] Such as Sabbaths, and "new moons."

do remember you in the sacrifices which we offer.] The Jews prayed for the prosperity of any kingdom or state whereto they were subject (Ezra vi. 10; Jer. xxix. 7) so long as they were subject to it; and this practice continues to the present day. But prayer and sacrifice on behalf of allies is not elsewhere mentioned. Probably Jonathan means to say, not that the Spartans were specially named in the Jewish public worship, but that, as prayer was made for the "brethren" generally, and the Spartans were "brethren," they were included.

13. the kings that are round about us have fought against us.] Exact accuracy is not to be expected in a diplomatic paper transmitted to a distant state. Probably Jonathan had especially in his mind the wars with the Syrian kings, Epiphanes, Eupator, Demetrius I., and Demetrius II. He may also have intended to glance at the attacks which had been made on the Jews by the Edomites (ch. v. 3), the people of Ptolemaïs, Tyre, and Sidon (ib. v. 15), and those of the Trans-Jordanic heathen (ib. vv. 9–51).

14. we would not be troublesome unto you.] We have therefore not asked you, nor any of our allies, for material help; but have carried on all the wars in which we have been engaged, without even seeking to obtain the aid of foreign troops.

15. we have help from heaven.] See above, ch. iii. 18–23; iv. 8–14, 30–34, &c. Though not miraculously helped, the Jews of Maccabean times believed, as firmly as their forefathers of any previous age, that success in war was granted them from God. The great odds against which they contended and their almost unbroken series of victories deepened and strengthened the impression.

16. we chose Numenius the son of Antiochus, and Antipater the son of Jason.] Hellenistic Jews, or at any rate Jews with Greek names, and belonging therefore to Hellenizing families, are again chosen (see above, ch. viii. 17) as channels of communication with the heathen, to whom they would be more acceptable than the more strictly orthodox. Antipater was perhaps a son of the Jason sent on the former occasion.

17. our letters.] Rather, "our letter." See the comment on v. 5.

19. Oniares.] This word is manifestly composed of the two names, Onias and Areus. Probably the original reading was as follows:—τοῦτο τὸ ἀντίγραφον τῶν ἐπιστο-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. nians to Onias the high priest, greeting:

21 It is found in writing, that the Lacedemonians and Jews are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham:

22 Now therefore, since this is come to our knowledge, ye shall do well to write unto us of your prosperity.

‖ Gr. peace.

23 We do write back again to you, that your cattle and goods are our's, and our's are your's. We do command therefore our ambassadors to make report unto you on this wise. B. C. cir. 144.

24 Now when Jonathan heard that Demetrius' princes were come to fight against him with a greater host than afore, λῶν ὧν ἀπέστειλεν Ὀνίᾳ Ἀρεύς· Ἀρεὺς βασιλεὺς Σπαρτιατῶν κ.τ.λ. A copyist omitted one Ἀρεὺς by accident, or thinking to correct a mistake, and the reading became that of which we have a trace in the Vulgate: "Hoc est rescriptum epistolarum quod miserat Oniæ Arius, rex Spartanorum." Another (later) copyist turned Ὀνίᾳ Ἀρεὺς into Ὀνιαρεὺς, which passed into Ὀνιάρης.

25 He removed from Jerusalem,

21. It is found in writing, that the Lacedemonians and the Jews are brethren.] Literally, "It was found in a writing." The reference seems to be to some particular (supposed) discovery. Cf. Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 4, § 10): Ἐντυχόντες γραφῇ τινι εὕρομεν. What the writing was, what its authority, how it made out the relationship, are points on which we are reduced to mere conjecture, and on which even a plausible conjecture is difficult. One thing alone the present writer tells us—the relationship was traced through Abraham. Both the Jews and the Lacedæmonians were regarded as his descendants (ἐκ γένους Ἀβραάμ). Hence the supposed connection could not have been traced through Peleg, regarded as the progenitor of the Pelasgi, since Peleg was not a descendant, but an ancestor, of Abraham, not to mention that the Spartans were not Pelasgi (Herod. i. 56). Probably some verbal resemblance was found, like that of Perseus with the Persians, or of Udæus with Judæa (Steph. Byz. ad voc. Ἰουδαία), on which the ethnic affinity was built up. In reality, the Jews and Spartans were races as diverse and unconnected as any two that it is possible to mention. The relationship, however, once asserted, was believed very generally, and affected the treatment and conduct of individuals (2 Macc. v. 9; Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' i. 26, § 1).

22, 23. The nexus of these verses is not shewn in our translation. They should be thus rendered:—"Now therefore, since this is come to our knowledge, ye shall do well to write to us of your prosperity; and we (in that case will) write back to you. Your cattle and goods are ours," &c. (On the particular mode of expressing alliance, cf. 1 Kings xxii. 4; 2 Kings iii. 7.)

The genuineness of this letter (vv. 20–23) has been called in question, and the very fact of any diplomatic intercourse between the Jews and Spartans denied; but the best authorities, even within the sceptical school, regard the intercourse as distinctly made out (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. pp. 245, 332); and the letter, though not an actual transcript of the original, but the translation back into Greek of a Hebrew translation of it, probably gives the real purport of the communication addressed by Areus I. to Onias, between B.C. 309 and B.C. 300.

§ 2. Second Campaign of Demetrius' Generals against Jonathan—Its Failure—Jonathan attacks the Zabdæans; after which he and Simon strengthen the Jewish Fortresses.

24–38. The defeat at Kadesh (ch. xi. 73, 74) was not accepted by the Demetrian generals as decisive. They still hoped to get the better of Jonathan. Accordingly, in B.C. 144, having collected a large force, they again advanced upon Palestine by the Orontes Valley, intending to repeat their invasion. Jonathan, however, was not inclined to allow his own territory to be the seat of war, but crossed the frontier and met the invaders in the old "land of Hamath," known at the time as "Amathis." The two armies encamped opposite each other; and Jonathan learned by his spies that he was to be attacked by night; but his preparations so deranged the enemy's plans that, instead of carrying them out, they fled hastily, leaving their camp-fires burning. He pursued as far as the river Eleutherus, but was unable to come up with them. The retreat, however, set him free to act on the offensive, and he at once fell on a hostile Arab tribe, the Zabdæans, whom he defeated, after which he took possession of Damascus. Simon, meanwhile, was active in the south, where he occupied Ascalon and Joppa, securing the latter by a strong garrison. Efforts were then made to isolate the Acra of Jerusalem, which the Syrians still occupied; the wall of Jerusalem was repaired; and a

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144.

and met them in the land of Amathis: for he gave them no respite ‖to enter his country.

‖ Or, to set foot in his country: or, to invade his country.

26 He sent spies also unto their tents, who came again, and told him that they were appointed to come upon them in the night season.

27 Wherefore so soon as the sun was down, Jonathan commanded his men to watch, and to be in arms, that all the night long they might be ready to fight: also he sent forth centinels round about the host.

28 But when the adversaries heard that Jonathan and his men were ready for battle, they feared, and trembled in their hearts, and ‖they kindled fires in their camp.

B. C. cir. 144.

‖ Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 2. they went away.

29 Howbeit Jonathan and his company knew it not till the morning: for they saw the lights burning.

30 Then Jonathan pursued after them, but overtook them not: for they were gone over the river Eleutherus.

31 Wherefore Jonathan turned to the Arabians, who were called ‖Zabadeans, and smote them, and took their spoils.

‖ Joseph. Gr. Nabatheans, or, Zabatheans.

32 And removing thence, he came to Damascus, and so passed through all the country.

33 Simon also went forth, and fortified post established between Jerusalem and Joppa, at Adida. The Demetrians were thoroughly worsted; but it was perhaps not quite clear to the opposite party, that they were advantaged—the Jewish chieftain may have appeared to them bent on making his principality altogether independent.

25. the land of Amathis.] The gentle elevation which, midway in the Cœlesyrian valley, forms the watershed separating the stream of the Orontes from that of the Litany, was known in ancient times as "the entering in of Hamath" (Num. xxxiv. 8, &c.), and the valley beyond the "entering in" was the "land of Hamath" (ἡ Ἀμαθῖτις χώρα). Hamath itself was situated at the distance of above 70 miles from the watershed, but the whole of the upper valley was considered to belong to it, and (as the present passage shews) retained its name, though the town had become Epiphaneia.

26. He sent spies also unto their tents.] Rather, "into their camp."

27. he sent forth centinels.] Rather "outposts" or "picquets" (προφύλακες). This was not an ordinary practice in the East, or even among the Romans. The gates and walls of camps were guarded; but detached bodies of troops, in front of the walls or lines, were uncommon. Their employment on this occasion marks Jonathan's military capacity.

28. trembled in their hearts.] Literally, "cowered." An access of panic fear seems to be spoken of. It had been expected that the Jews would be taken unawares, and easily defeated and dispersed. When they were found on their guard, ready to resist an attack, not only did the attack seem hopeless, but the assailants despaired of success altogether, and determined on a hasty retreat.

they kindled fires in their camp.] As a means of concealing their retreat. The stratagem has been largely employed, both in ancient and in modern times. (See 2 Kings vii. 7; Herod. iv. 135: Polyb. ii. 25, § 5; iii. 50, § 9; ix. 5, § 7, &c.)

30. they were gone over the river Eleutherus.] The boundary between Palestine and Syria, as already mentioned. (See the comment on ch. xi. 7.)

31. the Arabians who were called Zabadeans.] This tribe is not elsewhere mentioned. It probably held possession of that portion of the Antilibanus range where we still find existing the names Zebdeni and Zebad. The former is a village of nearly 3000 inhabitants, situated in a plain, known as the "Ard Zebdeni," on the course of the upper Barada, and upon the direct route from Balbek to Damascus. A rivulet which rises behind the village is called the "Moiet Zebdeni," and the mountains of the district are known as the Jebel Zebdeni. (See Burckhardt, 'Syria,' p. 3.) Kefr Zebad is a village not far from Zebdeni, on the western slopes of the Antilibanus. Josephus has wrongly substituted the well-known "Nabatæans," who are never found so far north, and who were friendly to the Jews (ch. v. 25), for the obscure Zabadæans.

32. he came to Damascus.] Compare ch. xi. 62. From the two passages combined we gather that Jonathan now regarded Damascus as within the limits of his principality, and exercised authority over it. Damascus had sunk into comparative insignificance on the rise of Antioch, but was still a large and populous town.

33. Simon also went forth.] Simon's new rank and position (ch. xi. 59), though not rendering him independent of Jonathan,

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 144. passed through the country unto Ascalon, and the holds there adjoining, from whence he turned aside to Joppe, and won it.

34 For he had heard that they would deliver the hold unto them that took Demetrius' part; wherefore he set a garrison there to keep it.

35 After this came Jonathan home again, and calling the elders of the people together, he consulted with them about building strong holds in Judea, 36 And making the walls of Jerusalem higher, and raising a great mount between the tower and the city, for to separate it from the city, that so it might be alone, that men might neither sell nor buy in it. B. C. cir. 144.

37 Upon this they came together to build up the city, ‖forasmuch as part of the wall toward the brook on the east side was fallen down, and they repaired that which was called Caphenatha.

‖ Or, According to the Roman reading, and he came near to the wall of the brook toward the east.

38 Simon also set up Adida in Sephela, and made it strong with gates and bars.

seemed to call upon him for some correspondent exertion. Accordingly, during Jonathan's absence in the Cœlesyrian and Damascene regions, he busied himself in obtaining a firmer grasp of the south.

passed through the country unto Ascalon.] Ascalon had submitted to Jonathan in B.C. 147 (ch. x. 86). On its situation and history, see the comment ad loc.

turned aside to Joppe, and won it.] Rather, "occupied it." Joppa had been "won" by Jonathan in the same year as Ascalon (ch. x. 76), and had remained in his possession; but there was a danger, as we learn from v. 34, of the inhabitants, or a portion of them, admitting the soldiers of Demetrius into the citadel, and so handing the place over to the Demetrian party. To frustrate this scheme, Simon anticipated the movement, by suddenly occupying the citadel with his own troops and leaving a sufficient garrison there.

35. Jonathan . . . calling the elders of the people together.] See the comment on v. 6. Ewald regards this as the calling together of a "popular assembly" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 332); but a consultation of the γερουσία of v. 6 is probably intended.

36. raising a great mount between the tower and the city.] No remains of any such "mount" are now to be seen. Indeed, the design seems never to have been executed, since when Simon obtained possession of the Acra, it still overlooked the Temple, and was such a menace that he not only destroyed it, but cut down the hill on which it stood (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 7).

that men might neither sell nor buy in it.] The words "in it" are added by our translators, and give a wrong sense. Evidently, the erection of a mound between the citadel and the Temple could be no hindrance to traffic among those who were inside the citadel itself. Jonathan's object was to impede the traffic which went on between the garrison of the Acra and the Jews without, especially those of his own portion of Jerusalem, that situated on the Temple hill. He wished, as Josephus says ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 5, § 11), to restrict their marketing, and diminish their supply of provisions.

37. part of the wall . . . was fallen down.] Ἔπεσε is undoubtedly the true reading, and not ἤγγισε.

the brook on the east side.] I.e. the brook Kidron, or Cedron, the deep ravine on the eastern side of Jerusalem, which carries off the heavy rains that sometimes fall, but is dry during by far the greater part of the year. A portion of the wall along the brow of the hill overhanging the ravine had "fallen," apparently by natural decay.

that which was called Caphenatha.] "Caphenatha" is not otherwise known to us. It is conjectured to have been "a small fortification" on the eastern side of the city (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 332, note 8). Perhaps it was "the tower that lay out" (Neh. iii. 26).

38. Adida in Sephela.] Adida is probably the 'Hadid' of the Canonical Books (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34). According to Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 4), it was situated on a hill, at the edge of the low plain of the Shefelah, on which it looked down. Eusebius places it three miles east of Lydda (Ludd): and in this position is found a village, called "El-Haditheh," which occupies the summit of a round hill, and answers perfectly to all the notices of Adida. The place lay on the direct route between Joppa and Jerusalem. We must regard its occupation and fortification as intended to check the march of any Syrian force which might be landed at Joppa, and attempt to seize Jerusalem.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144.

39 Now Tryphon went about to get the kingdom of Asia, and to kill Antiochus the king, that he might set the crown upon his own head.

40 Howbeit he was afraid that Jonathan would not suffer him, and that he would fight against him; wherefore he sought a way how to take Jonathan, that he might kill him. So he removed, and came to Bethsan.

41 Then Jonathan went out to meet him with forty thousand men chosen for the battle, and came to Bethsan.

42 Now when Tryphon saw that Jonathan came with so great a force, he durst not stretch his hand against him;

B. C. cir. 144.

43 But received him honourably, and commended him unto all his friends, and gave him gifts, and commanded his men of war to be as obedient unto him, as to himself.

44 Unto Jonathan also he said, Why hast thou put all this people to so great trouble, seeing there is no war betwixt us?

45 Therefore send them now home again, and choose a few men to wait on thee, and come thou with me to Ptolemais, for I will give it thee, and

§ 3. The Design of Tryphon to make himself King—He succeeds in entrapping Jonathan—The Remnant of Jonathan's Army makes good its Retreat.

39–53. It is probable that Tryphon had had his own interests in view from the first moment that he came forward as the champion of Antiochus. But hitherto he had masked his personal ambition under the pretence of advocating a particular cause. The time, however, had now come when he thought he might venture to throw off the mask. A boy king would naturally stir little enthusiasm: and the cause of Antiochus had sunk low, before Tryphon initiated the new movement. He might hope, in striking for the crown, to rally to his standard all the more ambitious spirits, and the bulk of those who were discontented with the Seleucid rule. But he felt that Jonathan could not be counted on to support his enterprise. He therefore resolved to remove him before proceeding to the last extreme against the titular king. The author relates, in vv. 40–48, the attempt of Tryphon against Jonathan, and its successful issue. In vv. 49–53, he gives the sequel of the attempt—(1) the escape of the 2000 men whom Jonathan had left in Galilee; and (2) the consternation of the Jews and satisfaction of their enemies at what had befallen Jonathan.

39. Tryphon went about to get the kingdom of Asia.] Tryphon's ambitious views are attested by Josephus, Appian, Justin, Strabo, and others. His actual assumption of kingly power is proved by his coins.

and to kill Antiochus.] See ch. xiii. 31, and comment ad loc.

40. So he removed, and came to Bethsan.] Bethsan was in the Jordan valley, on the right bank of the stream, at the point where the valley of Jezreel opens into the Jordan vale from the west. It was a place of great antiquity, having belonged to the Canaanites before the entrance of Israel into Palestine, and it remained in their possession till long after (Judg. i. 27). A probable etymology of the word is "the house of San," or "of the Sun," San being the Babylonian Sun-God. In Roman times the place was undoubtedly called "Scythopolis" (Strab. xvi. 2, § 40: Plin. 'H. N.' v. 18; Polyb. v. 70, § 4, &c.); but under what circumstances the change of name took place, or what exactly was intended to be signified by it, is uncertain. At present the old name has recovered itself, and the village which marks the site is known as "Beisan." Tryphon's coming so far south unopposed is an indication that Jonathan was taken by surprise.

41. Jonathan went out to meet him with forty thousand men.] This number is very much larger than had as yet been brought into the field by any Maccabean leader, and marks the great increase of power and territory which had been effected under Jonathan, whose rule extended from Damascus to the borders of Egypt. The force was not the greatest that he could have raised, but one consisting of "picked men."

43. commended him unto all his friends.] Rather, "introduced him"—"brought him into their company."

gave him gifts.] Compare ch. x. 20, 60, 89; xi. 58, &c.

45. come thou with me to Ptolemais, for I will give it thee.] At first sight, the device by which Tryphon got Jonathan into his power seems too transparent to have imposed on any one who was not greatly wanting in

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. the rest of the strong holds and forces, and all that have any charge: as for me, I will return and depart: for this is the cause of my coming.

46 So Jonathan believing him did as he bade him, and sent away his host, who went into the land of Judea.

47 And with himself he retained but three thousand men, of whom he ‖ sent two thousand into Galilee, and one thousand went with him.

‖ Gr. left two thousand in Galilee.

48 Now as soon as Jonathan entered into Ptolemais, they of Ptolemais shut the gates, and took him, and all them that came with him they slew with the sword. B. C. cir. 144.

49 Then sent Tryphon an host of footmen and horsemen into Galilee, and into the great plain, to destroy all Jonathan's company.

50 But when they knew that Jonathan and they that were with him were taken and slain, they encouraged one another, and went close together, prepared to fight.

51 They therefore that followed upon them, perceiving that they were ready to fight for their lives, turned back again.

sagacity, and we feel inclined to be angry with Jonathan for his simplicity. But it must be borne in mind, that this was not the first occasion upon which the cession of Ptolemaïs had been suggested with an appearance of sincerity. Demetrius I. had made a similar offer during his war with Balas (ch. x. 39), certainly without any treacherous intent. Still, there were suspicious circumstances in Tryphon's rapid march without notice, and his sudden assumption of a friendly tone, which should have put the Jewish prince upon his guard; and we cannot altogether exonerate him from the charge of rashness and credulity.

and the rest of the strong holds.] "The strong holds" are the places in Judæa still occupied by Syrian garrisons, among which by far the most important was the Acra, or "citadel" of Jerusalem (see v. 36). The prospect of having these surrendered to him must have been very tempting to Jonathan; but the greater the value of the thing promised, the less likely was it that the promise was a sincere one.

and forces, and all that have any charge.] It was unlikely that the strongholds would be voluntarily surrendered. It was still more unlikely that they would be surrendered, with their garrisons, and with the civil officers who resided in them. Yet this was what Tryphon's words imported. It is strange that Jonathan did not share the feelings expressed by the familiar words—"Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

46. who went into the land of Judea.] Bethsan was reckoned to Galilee at this time, and was at a considerable distance from Judæa proper. Jonathan, by sending his troops back to Judæa, put it out of his power to recall them.

47. three thousand men, of whom he sent two thousand into Galilee.] Three thousand men were too many for a body-guard, too few for an army. Jonathan did well to reduce his three thousand to one, since he thereby endangered fewer lives, without really lessening his own chance of safety. When he had once consented to dismiss his army, he had put himself into Tryphon's power; and it was his best policy to appear to feel perfect confidence in the Syrian's pledged word.

49. into the great plain.] "The great plain" of this place is regarded by some as identical with "the great plain before Bethsan," mentioned in ch. v. 52. But, in the absence of any qualifying phrase, it is more natural to understand the really "great plain" of Palestine, reckoned at this time to Galilee, the "plain of Esdraelon." This was the level tract lying north-east of the Carmel range and watered by the Kishon river, which extended nearly twenty miles from the roots of Mount Gilboa to the pass into the plain of Akko, and was from five to ten miles broad. Here were the important towns of Megiddo, Jokneam, Taanach, En-gannim, Jezreel and Japhia, which Jonathan would be anxious to secure in case of any accident happening to himself, and hither would he most readily have sent the 2000 men, whom he probably dismissed on entering the Akko plain by the pass above mentioned. (See Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 2.)

to destroy all Jonathan's company.] I.e. the two thousand whom he had "sent into Galilee" (v. 47).

50. when they knew that Jonathan and they that were with him were taken and slain.] Report exaggerated the disaster. The men had been slain (v. 48); but Jonathan had merely been arrested, and was a prisoner in the hands of Tryphon. (See ch. xiii. 15–19.)

went close together.] Or "marched in close array," like the Ten Thousand on their return from Cunaxa (Xen. 'Anab.' iii. 3, § 6, &c.).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144.

52 Whereupon they all came into the land of Judea peaceably, and there they bewailed Jonathan, and them that were with him, and they were sore afraid; wherefore all Israel made great lamentation.

53 Then all the heathen that were round about them sought to destroy them: for said they, They have no captain, nor any to help them: now therefore let us make war upon them, and take away their memorial from among men. B. C. cir. 144.

CHAPTER XIII.

8 Simon is made captain in his brother Jonathan's room. 19 Tryphon getteth two of Jonathan's sons into his hands, and slayeth their father. 27 The tomb of Jonathan. 36 Simon is favoured by Demetrius, 40 and winneth Gaza, and the tower at Jerusalem.

NOW when Simon heard that Tryphon had gathered toge-

52. they bewailed Jonathan.] I.e. they mourned him, as dead, being still under the impression that he had been slain with his troops (see v. 50).

all Israel made great lamentation.] Compare the lamentation at the death of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25), and the more recent one at the death of Judas (ch. ix. 20).

53. all the heathen that were round about them sought to destroy them.] This is rather rhetorical than historical. We see no movement of "the heathen round about" after the death of Jonathan, as we do after the first successes of Judas (ch. v. 9–15). The heathen no doubt rejoiced and were excited, but there was no general attack. Tryphon alone followed up his first blow by an invasion (ch. xiii. 1, 12, 20), which however was attended with no great success.

take away their memorial from among men.] Compare ch. iii. 35.

CHAPTER XIII.

§ 1. SIMON COMES FORWARD, AND IS ACCEPTED AS LEADER IN JONATHAN'S PLACE—HIS CAMPAIGN AGAINST TRYPHON.

1–24. Simon occupied a position of greater dignity (ch. xi. 59) at the capture of Jonathan, than that which Jonathan had held at the death of Judas. Hence there was at this crisis no interregnum. Simon came forward at once in his brother's place, and actively exerted himself to compose the fears of the people, and rouse them to fresh efforts. He offered himself to be their leader; and his offer was, as a matter of course, accepted, since there was no one else to whom it was possible for the people to have turned. His first measures were thoroughly judicious; he completed the fortifications of Jerusalem (v. 10), and sent a trusty captain to secure Joppa (v. 11). Tryphon's counter movements were not wanting in cleverness. He marched his army straight into Judæa, hoping to find affairs in disorder, but, when met by Simon at Adida, he astutely altered his tone, declared that he only held Jonathan in confinement on account of his being indebted to the Syrian crown, and promised to release him on the payment of 100 talents of silver, and on receiving two of his sons as hostages for his good behaviour (v. 16). Simon, though misdoubting him, thought it necessary to accept the conditions (vv. 17–19), and "sent the money and the children," but without result, since Tryphon was false to his word, and still kept Jonathan a prisoner. Foiled, however, in his attack by Simon's advance to Adida, he formed a new plan, and "marching round the western mountains of Judah in a southerly direction" (Ewald. 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 333), made a fresh attempt upon Judæa by way of Adora, south-west of Hebron, laying the country waste far and wide, and compelling Simon to take the field against him in this quarter (v. 20). Meanwhile, by Simon's orders, the siege of the Acra at Jerusalem was pressed, and the garrison brought into difficulties. Tryphon was intreated by the famished defenders to come to their relief, and had arranged to conduct a convoy to Jerusalem, when a sudden fall of snow rendered the execution of his plans impossible. Further operations under the circumstances seemed hopeless; and the adventurer returned through the Trans-Jordanic region to Syria, ridding himself on the way of his prisoner, Jonathan, whom he put to death at an obscure village called Bascama (v. 23).

1. when Simon heard.] Simon had probably been left to conduct affairs in Judæa, when Jonathan marched at the head of his 40,000 men upon Bethsan. Originally designated by Mattathias to be the counsellor of his brethren (ch. ii. 65), he had gradually come more and more forward, until, in the time of Jonathan, he was distinctly recognised as only second to him in rank and authority. Hence, on Jonathan's disappearance, it at once devolved upon him to determine on the course which should be taken.

that Tryphon had gathered together a great host.] The treachery practised upon Jonathan was designed as a step towards the subjugation

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. ther a great host to invade the land of Judea, and destroy it,

2 And saw that the people was in great trembling and fear, he went up to Jerusalem, and gathered the people together,

3 And gave them exhortation, saying, Ye yourselves know what great things I, and my brethren, and my father's house, have done for the laws and the sanctuary, the battles also and troubles which we have seen,

4 By reason whereof all my brethren are slain for Israel's sake, and I am left alone.

5 Now therefore be it far from me, that I should spare mine own life in any time of trouble: for I am no better than my brethren.

6 Doubtless I will avenge my nation, and the sanctuary, and our wives, and our children: for all the heathen are gathered to destroy us of very malice.

B. C. cir. 144.

7 Now as soon as the people heard these words, their spirit revived.

8 And they answered with a loud voice, saying, Thou shalt be our leader instead of Judas and Jonathan thy brother.

9 Fight thou our battles, and whatsoever thou commandest us, that will we do.

10 So then he gathered together all the men of war, and made haste [a] to finish the walls of Jerusalem, and he fortified it round about.

[a] See ch. 12. 36.

11 Also he sent Jonathan the son of Absalom, and with him a great power, to Joppe: who casting out of Judæa. The "great host" was held in readiness, and no sooner was Jonathan a prisoner than it commenced its march. Simon found himself confronted with a great danger upon the frontier, and almost unsupported at home.

2. the people was in great trembling and fear.] Compare ch. xii. 52.

he . . . gathered the people together.] Something more than a meeting of the council (ch. xii. 35) seems to be here intended. Simon meant to suggest his elevation to the post of leader; and this position could only be conferred by the nation at large, or some popular gathering sufficiently representing it. (Compare ch. ix. 28–31.)

3. my father's house.] Compare ch. xiv. 26; xvi. 2. Grimm concludes from this, that the brothers and other relatives of Mattathias had taken part in the struggle; but it may be questioned whether the expression is not simply pleonastic. We never hear of any relatives of Mattathias, except his sons, assisting him.

4. all my brethren are slain.] Simon, like the Jews generally (ch. xii. 50–52), believed Jonathan to be dead. His three other brothers had actually fallen in fight (ch. vi. 46; ix. 18, 36–38).

6. Doubtless I will avenge my nation.] In offering himself as an "avenger," Simon suggested his appointment to be leader. It was a post of honour certainly, but still more a post of danger. Simon's courage is to be commended; a more timid man would have shrunk from the perils.

all the heathen are gathered to destroy us.] Compare ch. xii. 53. Simon may well have expected a general rising, though apparently none took place.

8. Thou shalt be our leader.] Compare the appointment of Jonathan (ch. ix. 30). It is not clear whether the "leadership" carried with it the high priesthood, or whether that office remained for a time in abeyance. Simon is first addressed as "High Priest" in the letter sent him by Demetrius (infra, v. 36).

10. he . . . made haste to finish the walls of Jerusalem.] The strengthening and, in part, rebuilding of the walls had been commenced by Jonathan while he was on friendly terms with Tryphon and at war with Demetrius (ch. xii. 36, 37). Simon had therefore only to "finish" what was already begun.

he fortified it round about.] I.e. "strengthened the defences round the entire circuit of the wall."

11. Jonathan the son of Absalom.] This individual has not been previously mentioned. He may, not improbably, have been the son of the "Absalom" mentioned in ch. xi. 70, as the father of a "Mattathias" who was one of the "captains of the host." Absalom, a devoted adherent of the Maccabeans, had named his sons after the most distinguished members of the patriotic family.

to Joppe.] As the port from which Jerusalem was most accessible, Joppa had a quite peculiar importance. We see traces of this in ch. x. 76 and xii. 33: as also in the fortification of Adida (ch. xii. 38), which lay on the direct route between the two cities.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. them that were therein remained there in it.

12 So Tryphon removed from Ptolemais with a great power to invade the land of Judea, and Jonathan was with him in ward.

13 But Simon pitched his tents at Adida, over against the plain.

14 Now when Tryphon knew that Simon was risen up instead of his brother Jonathan, and meant to join battle with him, he sent messengers unto him, saying,

15 Whereas we have Jonathan thy brother in hold, it is for money that he is owing unto the king's treasure, ‖ concerning the business that was committed unto him.

‖ Or, for the affairs, or, offices, that he had, or, the necessary uses which he had.

16 Wherefore now send an hundred talents of silver, and two of his sons for hostages, that when he is at liberty he may not revolt from us, and we will let him go.

B. C. cir. 144.

17 Hereupon Simon, albeit he perceived that they spake deceitfully unto him, yet sent he the money and the children, lest peradventure he should procure to himself great hatred of the people:

18 Who might have said, Because I sent him not the money and the children, therefore is Jonathan dead.

19 So he sent them the children and the hundred talents: howbeit Tryphon dissembled, neither would he let Jonathan go.

20 And after this came Tryphon to invade the land, and destroy it, going round about by the way that leadeth unto Adora: but Simon and

Simon, distrustful of the native inhabitants, determined on their expulsion at this time, in order to secure his own hold upon the place. (See Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 3.)

12. Tryphon removed from Ptolemais with a great power to invade the land of Judea.] Tryphon's march was probably along the coast, through the plain of Akko, and round the base of Carmel into the tract known as Sharon. Thence he struck inland towards Jerusalem.

Jonathan was with him in ward.] He took Jonathan with him, to convince the Jews that he was still alive, and to make some profit out of his captive.

13. Simon pitched his tents at Adida.] Adida had been occupied and fortified (ch. xii. 38), as commanding the approaches to Jerusalem from the coast. It looked down on the Shefelah, or great Philistine plain (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' l. s. c.). No invader could venture to march past it, and proceed along the direct road to Jerusalem, while it lay unconquered in his rear. Tryphon had to choose between delivering an attack on the position, in which he would probably have suffered a repulse, and advancing by some other line of route. Having determined on the latter course, he set himself to utilise the possession of his captive by proposing terms of redemption, which he had no intention to observe, as related in the three following verses.

14. Simon was risen up.] I.e. "was at the head of affairs." Compare ch. ix. 31.

15. Whereas we have Jonathan thy brother in hold.] Apparently this was the first intimation that Simon, or any of the Jews, had of Jonathan's being still alive.

it is for money that he is owing unto the king's treasure.] This, of course, was a mere pretext. It may, however, have had a foundation in fact. Tryphon may have regarded Jonathan as bound to pay over annually to the royal treasury certain sums, which Jonathan considered himself entitled to keep. The relations of the Judean sub-king to the Syrian monarch were at this time unsettled; and it might well be that their respective views and claims clashed.

concerning the business that was committed unto him.] Rather, "concerning the offices which he held." The governorship and high priesthood are probably intended.

16. now send an hundred talents of silver.] If Attic talents are intended, as is probable, the sum demanded was considerable, exceeding 24,000*l.* Simon felt compelled to pay it, lest he should seem to interfere, for his own advantage, with his brother's being set at liberty. But he was not deceived by Tryphon's artifices. (See v. 17.)

19. he sent them the children.] Rather, "he sent the children." There is no word corresponding to "them" in the original: and the children and money were sent to Tryphon.

dissembled.] Rather, "hid," or "broke his word."

20. after this came Tryphon . . . going round about by the way that leadeth unto Adora.] Adora is probably the "Adoraim" of the author of Chronicles, which was forti-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 144. his host marched against him in every place, wheresoever he went.

21 Now they that were in the tower sent messengers unto Tryphon, to the end that he should hasten his coming unto them by the wilderness, and send them victuals.

22 Wherefore Tryphon made ready all his horsemen to come that night: but there fell a very great snow, by reason whereof he came not. So he departed, and came into the country of Galaad. B. C. cir. 144.

23 And when he came near to Bascama, he slew Jonathan, who was buried there.

24 Afterward Tryphon returned and went into his own land.

25 Then sent Simon, and took the bones of Jonathan his brother, and buried them in Modin, the city of his fathers. cir. 143.

fied by Rehoboam against Shishak (2 Chr. xi. 9), and which lay on the southern border of Judæa, between Lachish and Hebron. The MSS. of Josephus shorten the name into Dora, which corresponds closely to the modern "Dura," a village in the required position (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. ii. p. 215). The Syrians seem to have regarded the approach to Jerusalem as easier from the side of Idumæa than from any other quarter. (See ch. iv. 29; vi. 31–54.)

Simon and his host marched against him.] As Tryphon made his circuitous march, Simon, acting on an inner circle, always opposed his troops between the army of Tryphon and Jerusalem. Meanwhile he was strenuously pushing the siege of the Acra at that place, and had almost brought the Syrian garrison to extremities. (See the next verse.)

21. they that were in the tower.] See above, ch. xii. 36. It is clear that Simon had continued the policy of Jonathan with respect to the Acra, and had so far succeeded in cutting off its supplies as greatly to distress the garrison, which was therefore urgent on Tryphon to come or send to its relief.

by the wilderness.] The tract south-east of Jerusalem, towards the Dead Sea, was known as "the wilderness of Judæa." The garrison suggested a march through this tract, which was undefended by any fortress.

22. Tryphon made ready all his horsemen to come that night.] A night march of the cavalry for the relief of the fortress was arranged, the intention being no doubt to traverse the whole distance—about twenty miles—before dawn. "But there fell a very great snow." The somewhat unusual occurrence of a heavy fall of snow frustrated the enterprise, and induced Tryphon to break up from his quarters, and return through the Trans-Jordanic region to his own country. Snow falls in Palestine occasionally between October and March. It rarely lies more than a day; but sometimes it is deep, and remains on the ground several days, or even as much as a fortnight. Heavy falls occurred in the winters of 1722, 1754, 1818, and 1854–5. (See Grove, in Dr. Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 692.)

he departed, and came into the country of Galaad.] Grimm conjectures that he marched round the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, thus reaching Gilead through the Moabite territory.

23. when he came near to Bascama.] Bascama, shortened by Josephus into Basca ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 5), is an unknown site in the Trans-Jordanic region. No mention of it occurs anywhere excepting as the scene of Jonathan's murder.

§ 2. SIMON REMOVES THE BODY OF JONATHAN TO MODEÏN, AND ERECTS A MAGNIFICENT MONUMENT THERE OVER THE GRAVES OF HIS FATHER, HIS MOTHER, AND HIS FOUR BROTHERS.

25–30. On learning his brother's death and burial at Bascama, Simon sent persons to obtain the body and convey it to Modeïn, the native place of the Maccabee family (ch. ii. 1–18), where Mattathias (ch. ii. 70) and the three sons previously deceased were already buried (ch. ix. 19; xiii. 27). It was probably not until after he had captured the Acra (v. 50) and settled himself in his kingdom that Simon undertook the architectural works mentioned in vv. 27–29, which are noticed at this point of the narrative, from the connection of subject-matter, and not of time.

25. Then sent Simon, and took the bones of Jonathan.] By a well-known Hebrew idiom, the dead body of a man is called "his bones," whatever condition it is in. Thus the mummy of Joseph is spoken of as his "bones" in Gen. l. 25, and Ex. xiii. 19; and the bodies of Saul and his sons, when taken from the wall of Bethshan, are called "their bones," in 1 Sam. xxxi. 13.

in Modin, the city of his fathers.] Compare ch. ii. 70; and on the site of Modin, or Modeïn, see the comment on ch. ii. 1.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 143.

26 And [b]all Israel made great lamentation for him, and bewailed him many days.

[b] ch. 9. 20.

27 Simon also built a monument upon the sepulchre of his father and his brethren, and raised it aloft to the sight, with hewn stone behind and before.

28 Moreover he set up seven pyramids, one against another, for his father, and his mother, and his four brethren.

B. C. cir. 143.

29 And in these he made cunning devices, about the which he set great pillars, and upon the pillars he made all their armour for a perpetual memory, and by the armour ships carved, that they might be seen of all that sail on the sea.

30 This is the sepulchre which he

26. all Israel made great lamentation.] This seems to have been a second mourning, additional to the premature one mentioned in ch. x. 52. It is described in almost the same words as the mourning for Judas (ch. ix. 20), a fact which would seem to shew that the Jews held the two brothers in equal, or nearly equal, honour.

27. Simon also built a monument.] Compare Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 5. It had been customary for the Jews to bury in rock-cut graves, with little or no external display. The Greeks and Romans, on the contrary, like the Egyptians, Lydians, Lycians, and other Orientals, erected conspicuous monuments over their dead, which were often costly and magnificent. The vast monument raised by Artemisia in honour of her husband, Mausolus, at Halicarnassus, shortly before the time of Alexander, was greatly admired by the ancients, and was even reckoned one of the wonders of the world. The example thus set spread, and many tombs of much architectural pretension exist in Asia and Africa which follow the type of the mausoleum, and appear to have been reproductions, to a greater or less extent, of its principal features. The monument erected by Simon at Modeïn is no exception to the general rule. It was "of hewn stone behind and before;" it was "raised aloft to the sight;" it had "great pillars" set about it, which, according to Josephus, formed porticoes (στοαί). Mr. Fergusson's restoration of the Mausoleum ('Hist. of Architecture,' vol. i. p. 249) furnishes probably a good idea of the general character of Simon's monument; which was, however, different from all similar structures by the combination of the pyramid with the pillared tomb, of the old sepulchral architecture of Egypt with the comparatively recent style of Asia Minor. Simon's "seven pyramids" can only have been adjuncts to his main structure, from which they were probably separated by some little distance.

with hewn stone.] Literally, "with polished stone." Josephus adds that the colour of the stone was white.

28. seven pyramids.] So also Josephus. As six would have been the proper number for his parents and brothers, we must suppose that Simon looked forward to the time when he too would be gathered to his fathers, and erected one pyramid for himself. It was common in the East for monarchs to prepare their own tombs.

one against another.] The pyramids were built, it would seem, in two rows, so that each had its fellow opposite to it. This arrangement could only extend to six pyramids out of the seven. The seventh must have stood by itself, without a companion.

29. in these he made cunning devices.] Rather, "on these," or "for these." The pyramids were not plain, like the Egyptian, but ornamented with sculpture on their surfaces.

about the which he set great pillars.] The pillars appear to have been set "about" the pyramids, in a manner quite unknown in Egypt, but probably with the object of marking out a temenos, or "sacred enclosure," within which no one might intrude. A set of pillars, which seem, like these, to have been unconnected, mark out the temenos attached to the Tomb of Cyrus. (See 'Ancient Monarchies,' vol. iv. p. 295.)

upon the pillars he made all their armour.] Rather, "he represented panoplies." Imitations, probably, of the ordinary Greek trophy, which consisted of a helmet and coat of mail, supported by a post or trunk of a tree.

ships carved.] The "ships" probably commemorated the capture of Joppa (ch. x. 76), and the impulse thereby given to the commercial activity of the Jews. Cf. ch. xiv. 5.

that they might be seen.] It is impossible that the details of the sculptures can have been visible from the Mediterranean, which was at least twelve miles off; but the main monument, and even the pyramids, may, in the clear Syrian atmosphere, have been discernible from that distance.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 143 made at Modin, and it standeth yet unto this day.

31 Now Tryphon dealt deceitfully with the young king Antiochus, and slew him.

32 And he reigned in his stead, B. C. 142. and crowned himself king of Asia, and brought a great calamity upon the land.

33 Then Simon built up the strong holds in Judea, and fenced them about with high towers, and great walls, and gates, and bars, and laid up victuals ‖ therein. B. C. cir. 142.

‖ Gr. in the strong holds.

34 Moreover Simon chose men, and sent to king Demetrius, to the end he should give the land an immunity, because ‖ all that Tryphon did was to spoil.

‖ Gr. all Tryphon's doings were robberies.

30. it standeth yet unto this day.] Josephus says that it still remained when he wrote (about A.D. 70). So also Eusebius ('Onomasticon,' ad voc. MODIM), writing about A.D. 320. Modern researches are thought to have discovered some trace of it in the remains of large sepulchral vaults and broken columns near the modern village of Medieh; but the traces are few, and perhaps not altogether certain. (See the 'Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund' for April 1873, p. 93).

§ 3. TRYPHON MURDERS THE YOUNG ANTIOCHUS, AND BECOMES KING — SIMON MAKES A TREATY WITH DEMETRIUS.

31–42. After three years and a half of hesitation Tryphon (in B.C. 142) threw off the mask, murdered the puppet king, whose cause he had professed to espouse, and assumed the crown himself. Simon, upon this, broke off all relations with his brother's murderer, and entered into negotiations with Demetrius, who still maintained the struggle with Tryphon from Seleucia, where he had fixed his head-quarters. Naturally Demetrius received his overtures favourably, and proposed the terms which are given in vv. 36–40. These terms involved the practical independence of Judæa. So important was the new agreement considered, that in connection with it a new era was set up, which thenceforth prevailed in legal instruments and contracts, though the Seleucid era was not wholly disused.

31. Tryphon dealt deceitfully with the young king Antiochus.] According to Livy ('Epit.' lv. ad fin.), he gave out that Antiochus suffered from calculus, and required an operation for his relief, which the physicians were instructed to render fatal. The unfortunate boy was but ten years of age at his decease.

32. he . . . crowned himself king of Asia.] The actual reign of Trypho is attested by a coin, which has the inscription Βασιλέως Τρύφωνος αὐτοκράτορος (Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible,' vol. iii. p. 1573). According to Clinton ('F. H.' vol. iii. pp. 327–8), he held the throne from early in B.C. 142 to late in B.C. 139– something short of four years. On the title "King of Asia," see the comment on ch. viii. 6.

brought a great calamity upon the land.] Josephus says that he shewed himself "a thorough lover of luxury," and thereby alienated the soldiery, who went over to the party of Demetrius. Diodorus speaks of his having carried on wars with various "satraps" in Mesopotamia, Cœlesyria, and the vicinity of Antioch (Fr. xxv.). His reign was undoubtedly a time of continuous warfare and disturbance, in which "the land," i.e. Syria, suffered greatly.

33. Then Simon built up the strong holds in Judea.] Simon was the most prudent of the sons of Mattathias (ch. ii. 65). He never let slip an opportunity. Tryphon's difficulty was his opportunity. While the civil war raged in his neighbourhood he held aloof from it, and devoted his energies to strengthening the defences of his own country. The chief "strongholds" of Judæa are enumerated in ch. ix. 50–52. Simon not only put them in a state to resist a sudden assault, but provisioned one and all against a siege.

high towers, and great walls, and gates, and bars.] These were, in the time of Simon, and for many centuries afterwards, the main defences of every fortified city. Walls were carried to a height which (it was thought) scaling-ladders could not equal: the towers which flanked them, or dominated them, were strengthened in every possible way; gates were made of the most solid and least combustible materials; bars were multiplied and augmented in thickness. Simon included in his scheme of defence all that the art of the time had elaborated with respect to the fortification of strongholds.

34. Simon . . . sent to king Demetrius.] Demetrius appears to have been at Seleucia (Liv. 'Epit.' lii.; Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' ii. 40, § 17; Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 7, § 1). Simon could readily communicate with him by sea from his port of Joppa (ch. xiv. 5).

to the end he should give the land an immunity.] Simon required the renunciation, on the part of the Syrian king, of all claim to tribute or tax of any sort or kind. Demetrius granted the demand (v. 39).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 142.

35 Unto whom king Demetrius answered and wrote after this manner:

36 King Demetrius unto Simon the high priest, and friend of kings, as also unto the elders and nation of the Jews, sendeth greeting:

37 The golden crown, and the scarlet robe, which ye sent unto us, we have received: and we are ready to make a stedfast peace with you, yea, and to write unto our officers, to confirm the immunities which we have granted.

38 And whatsoever covenants we have made with you shall stand; and the strong holds, which ye have builded, shall be your own. B. C. cir. 142.

39 As for any oversight or fault committed unto this day, we forgive it, and the crown tax also, which ye owe us: and if there were any other tribute paid in Jerusalem, it shall no more be paid.

40 And look who are meet among you to be in our court, let them be enrolled, and let there be peace betwixt us.

41 Thus the yoke of the heathen was taken away from Israel in the B C 142. hundred and seventieth year.

42 Then the people of Israel all that Tryphon did was to spoil.] Literally, "all the acts of Tryphon were robberies." It is not quite clear that this charge had any other foundation besides the exaction of the hundred talents (v. 19) as ransom. Tryphon had scarcely sufficient power to compel Simon to pay him tribute.

36. King Demetrius unto Simon the high priest.] Simon had become "High Priest" at the death of his brother Jonathan, if not even earlier. (See the comment on v. 8.) It is to be noted that Demetrius does not even claim to confer the title on him.

and friend of kings.] Compare ch. x. 16, 19, 20, 65; xi. 27, &c.

the elders.] Probably the members of the council or senate. (See ch. xii. 6, and comment ad loc.)

37. The golden crown and the scarlet robe.] On the practice of sending crowns of gold as presents to states or sovereigns about this period, see the comment on ch. viii. 14, and compare ch. x. 20. The word translated "scarlet robe" seems to mean really "a splendid over-robe embroidered with golden palm-twigs, as symbols of victory" (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 334, note [5]). Compare the Roman palmata.

to confirm the immunities which we have granted.] Rather, "to grant you immunities." The immunities intended may be those promised in ch. xi. 34, 35; but it is not so stated in the text, which is vague.

38. whatsoever covenants we have made with you.] This is a distinct reference to the treaty made with Jonathan in B.C. 146–5 (ch. xi. 29–37), and revived all its conditions.

the strong holds.] See v. 33.

39. As for any oversight or fault committed . . . we forgive it.] In these words there would seem to have been granted a general amnesty for all offences committed against the Syrian crown, and therefore for all the recent acts of rebellion of which the Jews had been guilty since they forsook the cause of Demetrius and espoused that of Tryphon (ch. xi. 54–59).

the crown tax also.] See the comment on ch. x. 29.

if there were any other tribute.] On the various dues claimed by the Syrian monarchs before the time of the Maccabee princes, and paid by the Jews, see ch. x. 29, 30. All these were to cease, and Judæa to be exempt from any payment whatever to the Syrian crown.

40. look who are meet among you to be in our court.] The invitation is not to furnish courtiers to the Syrian court, but soldiers towards the royal body-guard. Compare ch. x. 36. The value of a contingent of Jewish troops in his capital had been already experienced by Demetrius (ch. xi. 47–51). For "be in our court," translate, "be enrolled in our guard."

41. Thus the yoke of the heathen was taken away.] Ewald remarks with truth, that "the concessions and engagements of the kings and other potentates of this period generally lasted so long as they were destitute of the power to elude or repudiate them" ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 335); and Judæa was certainly still far from having secured absolute independence. Still it would seem that, on the whole, there was no time at which a greater step was made towards independence than the present, and thus it was quite reasonable that the year of the agreement with Demetrius (B.C. 142) should be made an era, and called "the first year of freedom." The "yoke of the heathen," if not now absolutely "taken away," was, at any rate, made considerably lighter.

Digitized by Microsoft®

began [c]to write in their instruments and contracts, In the first year of Simon the high priest, the governor and leader of the Jews. B. C. cir. 142.

[c] ch. 14. 27.

43 In those days Simon camped against Gaza, and besieged it round about; he made also an engine of war, and set it by the city, and battered a certain tower, and took it.

44 And they that were in the engine leaped into the city; whereupon there was a great uproar in the city:

45 Insomuch as the people of the city rent their clothes, and climbed upon the walls with their wives and children, and cried with a loud voice, beseeching Simon [‖]to grant them peace. B. C. cir. 142.

‖ Gr. to give them his right hand.

46 And they said, Deal not with us according to our wickedness, but according to thy mercy.

47 So Simon was appeased toward them, and fought no more against them, but put them out of the city, and cleansed the houses wherein the idols were, and so entered into it with songs and thanksgiving.

48 Yea, he put all uncleanness out

§ 4. SIMON'S SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF GAZARA.

43–48. That Simon turned his treaty with the Syrian king to account by at once engaging in the reduction of those fortresses which most interfered with Jewish independence is clear. But there is a doubt as to the city which he first attacked. All the MSS. of the First Book of Maccabees, and also the ancient versions, give the name of the city as "Gaza." Josephus, on the contrary, has "Gazara," both in 'A. J.' xii. 6, § 7, and in 'B. J.' i. 2, § 2. And probability is in favour of Gazara having been the object of attack. The remote Gaza was no obstacle to Judæan independence; the near Gazara was at once a menace and a real danger. It is most unlikely that, before attacking the great stronghold of his adversaries, the Acra at Jerusalem, Simon should have felt it incumbent on him to engage in a war at the extreme south of Philistia; it is quite reasonable that he should have delivered his first assault upon the fortress which was, next to the Acra, the main support of the Hellenizers (ch. x. 52), since its fall would at once be a relief to the neighbouring Judæans, and an alarm to the garrison of the Acra. The siege and capture appear to have occupied but a short time.

43. In those days.] See the comment on ch. i. 11.

Simon camped against Gaza.] On the probability that "Gazara" is the true reading, see the comment on vv. 43–48.

besieged it round about.] Literally, "surrounded it with his camps."

he made also an engine of war.] Most of the MSS. have ἑλεπόλεις, "engines of war," but the mention of a single such engine in the next verse seems to imply that the singular number must have been used here also. The helepolis was a moveable tower, resting on wheels, which was brought up close to the walls of a besieged town, and which operated both on the wall itself and on the defenders. Demetrius Poliorcetes had a single engine of this kind at Salamis in Cyprus, and was indebted to it for his successful siege of that place (Diod. Sic. xx. 48). He had also another at the siege of Rhodes, which was an engine of even greater power. As one "ironclad" of the first rank decides a modern seafight, so one of these "helepoleis" often determined the fate of a siege in ancient times.

44. there was a great uproar in the city.] Rather, "a great commotion."

45. climbed upon the wall.] Rather, "went up upon the walls." There would be no need to "climb," since the wall would be readily ascended on the inside by frequent flights of steps.

46. Deal not with us according to our wickedness.] The "wickedness" which the Gazarites confessed was probably that sin of religious apostasy which the Maccabee princes always so sternly denounced and sometimes so severely punished (ch. ii. 24, 44; iii. 8; vii. 24, &c.). They seem to have feared lest Simon should put them all to the sword.

47. So Simon was appeased toward them.] Simon accepted their submission and spared their lives, but forced them to quit the city, and re-peopled it with persons whom he could trust (v. 48).

cleansed the houses wherein the idols were.] We see by this that the "Hellenizing" of the time was not a mere preference for Grecian manners and amusements (ch. i. 14), but an actual lapse into idolatry. Images of heathen gods were set up in the private houses of the Hellenizers, and the customary offerings made to them. (Cf. ch. i. 55.)

48. he put all uncleanness out of it.] I.e. all the traces of idolatry—altars, images, emblems, sacrificial vessels and dresses, unclean beasts for sacrifice, &c.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 142. of it, and placed such men there as would keep the law, and made it stronger than it was before, and built therein a dwellingplace for himself.

49 They also of the tower in Jerusalem were kept so strait, that they could neither come forth, nor go into the country, nor buy, nor sell: wherefore they were in great distress for want of victuals, and a great number of them perished through famine.

50 Then cried they to Simon, beseeching him ‖ to be at one with them: which thing he granted them; and when he had put them out from thence, he cleansed the tower from pollutions:

B. C. cir. 141.

‖ Or, to make peace with them.

51 And entered into it the three and twentieth day of the second month, in the hundred seventy and first year, with thanksgiving, and branches of palm trees, and with harps, and cymbals, and with viols, and hymns, and songs: because placed such men there as would keep the law.] Not specially pious men, but men of the party of the orthodox, who could be trusted to allow no Hellenizing practices.

B. C. 141.

and built therein a dwellingplace for himself.] This furnishes a strong argument against the city intended being Gaza, since it would be quite out of the question that Simon should ever reside so far south. It is also a positive argument for the city being Gazara, since we find by verse 53 (cf. ch. xvi. i. 19, 21) that John Hyrcanus, the son of Simon, had his ordinary residence in that town.

§ 5. SIMON OBTAINS POSSESSION OF THE ACRA OR CITADEL OF JERUSALEM, AND MAKES HIS SON JOHN CAPTAIN OF THE HOST.

49–53. At length the time was come when the defenders of the Acra at Jerusalem could no longer maintain themselves. They had been the object of frequent attacks on the part of the Maccabee princes for above twenty years. (See ch. vi. 20, and cf. ch. xi. 20, 23, 41: xii. 36; xiii. 21.) Hitherto they had successfully held their most important position, and had been a thorn in the side of each successive Jewish ruler. From time to time the Syrian kings had relieved them, reinforced them, and no doubt re-victualled them. But, as the power of Syria declined and that of Judea increased, this ceased to be possible. Tryphon's hands were at this time too full for him to repeat the effort which had been baffled by the snow-storm (ch. xiii. 20–22). Demetrius had allied himself with Simon, and could not venture to offend him. The garrison was thus left to its fate. Simon, with the prudence which distinguished him (ch. ii. 65), resolved to waste no lives on an assault, but to trust to famine for the achievement of his purpose. The event was as he expected. In the spring of B.C. 141 the garrison of the Acra was starved out and surrendered itself (vv. 49, 50). Simon granted them their lives, and took possession of the vacant stronghold with every demonstration of joy and thankfulness (v. 51). He ordered an annual commemoration of the happy event (v. 52), demolished the Acra and (according to Josephus) cut down the hill on which it stood, while he made the Temple still stronger than it had been previously. Shortly afterwards, feeling the decay of his own physical strength, he made over the command of the army to his son John (v. 53), who afterwards became his successor (ch. xvi. 24).

49. They . . . of the tower . . . were kept so strait.] Cf. ch. xii. 36, where we find the policy of "straitening" the place and cutting off its supplies first adopted. No doubt, after getting rid of Tryphon, Simon was able to make his blockade of the place more effective.

nor buy, nor sell.] See the comment on ch. xii. 36.

50. he cleansed the tower from pollutions.] Here, too, idolatry had been practised, and purification was necessary before the place could be a fit dwelling for Jews. (Comp. v. 48.)

51. the three and twentieth day, &c.] The three and twentieth day of the second (Jewish) month, Zif or Iyar, of the 171st (Seleucid) year, would correspond with May B.C. 141.

with thanksgiving, and branches of palm trees.] The use of palm-branches had belonged originally to the feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 15), in the celebration of which it had been customary, not only to weave them into booths, but also to carry them in the hand. (See Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible,' vol. iii. p. 1421.) From this festive employment of it, the palm-branch came to be a general sign of rejoicing, and was used in triumphal processions of all kinds (2 Macc. x. 7; John xii. 13).

harps, and cymbals, and with viols.] Compare ch. iv. 54; where, however, the cithern (κιθάρα) takes the place of the viol (νάβλα) of this passage. Both words are probably translations of the same Hebrew original, nébel.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 141. there was destroyed a great enemy out of Israel.

52 He ordained also that that day should be kept every year with gladness. Moreover the hill of the temple that was by the tower he made stronger than it was, and there he dwelt himself with his company.

53 And when Simon saw that John his son was a valiant man, he made him captain of all the hosts; [d] and [d] he dwelt in Gazara.

[d] ch. 16. 1.

CHAPTER XIV.

B. C. 140

3 Demetrius is taken by the king of Persia. 4 The good deeds of Simon to his country. 18 The Lacedemonians and Romans renew their league with him. 26 A memorial of his acts is set up in Sion.

NOW in the hundred threescore and twelfth year king Demetrius gathered his forces together, and went into Media, to get him help to fight against Tryphon.

2 But when Arsaces, the king of there was destroyed a great enemy out of Israel.] Compare ch. i. 36, where the Acra is called "an evil adversary (διάβολος πονηρός) to Israel."

52. He ordained also that that day should be kept.] The celebration of the day does not appear to have continued very long. Josephus makes no mention of it.

the hill of the temple . . . he made stronger.] Josephus says nothing of this, but declares that Simon's first care, after taking the Acra, was to raze it to the ground, after which he proceeded to cut down the hill upon which the fortress had been built, so that it might no longer command the Temple site. Three years of continual labour on the part of the people of Jerusalem were necessary for the accomplishment of the work ('Ant. Jud.' xiii. 6, § 6). Ewald accepts his narrative as true in its main features; and the recent excavations conducted by the Palestine Exploration Society are thought to confirm it. (See the 'Transactions of the Bibl. Archæology Society,' vol. vii. pp. 309–315.) But ch. xiv. 37 throws some doubt on the story.

53. Simon saw that John his son was a valiant man.] Literally, "was a man," but probably in an intensive sense. Compare ch. v. 63.

he made him captain of all the hosts.] Simon must have been now advanced in years. He was the second son of Mattathias, and as early as B.C. 167–6 had earned a character for caution and prudence (ch. ii. 65). If he was then forty, he would have been now sixty-five. It was well that he should shift the active duties of military command on younger shoulders.

he dwelt in Gazara.] Gazara seems to have been viewed at this time as the Jewish fortress next in importance to Jerusalem (ch. xiv. 7). On this account Simon had "built therein a dwelling-place for himself;" and in this dwelling-place he now installed his son John, the commander-in-chief of his forces.

CHAPTER XIV.

§ 1. THE MARCH OF DEMETRIUS INTO MEDIA, AND HIS CAPTURE BY ARSACES.

1–3. The alliance which he had made with Simon, and the success of Simon against Tryphon (ch. xiii. 20–24, 43–50), encouraged Demetrius (in the year B.C. 141–0) to attempt an enterprise of extreme importance. This was no less a thing than the recovery of his eastern provinces out of the hands of the Parthians, who, in the space between B.C. 163 and B.C. 141, had overrun the entire country between Parthia proper and the Euphrates, thus reducing the kingdom of the Seleucidæ to less than half its previous dimensions. No effort had been as yet made to reclaim the lost territory. Demetrius seems now to have thought that he might safely leave Tryphon to be kept in check by his wife, Cleopatra, and his generals, while he marched eastward and drove the Parthians beyond his borders. He intended then to come back to Syria with an army levied from among his eastern subjects, and hoped by their aid speedily to reduce Tryphon to submission (v. 1). Justin tells us that he was at first very successful, gaining several victories over the Parthian monarch ('Hist. Phil.' xxxvi. 1); but after a while he fell a victim to Asiatic treachery, was entrapped at a conference, seized, and made a prisoner, while his army was at the same time surprised and defeated. (Compare App. 'Syriaca,' § 67; Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, § 17; Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 5, § 11, where, however, the expedition is misdated.)

1. in the hundred threescore and twelfth year.] The 172nd Seleucid year began in October B.C. 141, and ended in October B.C. 140. The expedition of Demetrius seems not to have been made till late in this year.

to get him help to fight against Tryphon.] The Parthian rule over the newly-conquered countries was detested (Justin, l. s. c.), and Demetrius had therefore reason to believe that the native inhabitants would flock to his standard as soon as they had the opportunity.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 140. Persia and Media, heard that Demetrius was entered within his borders, he sent one of his princes to take him alive:

3 Who went and smote the host of Demetrius, and took him, and brought him to Arsaces, by whom he was put in ward.

4 As for the land of Judea, [a]that was quiet all the days of Simon; for he sought the good of his nation in such wise, as that evermore his authority and honour pleased them well.

B. C. cir. 140.
[a] ch. 7. 50.

5 And as he was honourable in all his acts, so in this, that he took Joppe

In this he was not disappointed. Numbers of the Persians, Elymæans, and even the Bactrians joined him and fought on his side. Had he been proof against Parthian craft, his enterprise would probably have had all the success which he expected from it.

2. Arsaces, the king of Persia and Media.] This was Arsaces VI., better known as Mithridates I. of Parthia, the great conqueror who carried his arms from the Hindu Kush to the Euphrates, and transformed the Parthian kingdom into an Empire. His reign lasted from B.C. 174 to B.C. 136. All the Parthian monarchs took the name Arsaces, and placed it upon their coins. Those of Mithridates bear the legend, "The king of kings, the great and illustrious Arsaces." In calling him "king of Persia and Media," our author means to point out that, from the time of Mithridates, the Parthian monarchy became the great power of Western Asia, the true successor and representative of that Persian kingdom which had ruled over the East for above two centuries.

Demetrius was entered within his borders.] Mithridates claimed the newly-conquered provinces as his. Demetrius, no doubt, disputed the claim, and regarded himself as still in his own territories. Josephus says he crossed the Euphrates into Mesopotamia.

he sent one of his princes.] One of the vitaxæ, or governors of provinces, of whom there were fourteen or fifteen. (See Rawlinson's 'Sixth Monarchy,' p. 87.)

to take him alive.] This is probably our author's conclusion from the subsequent event. But it is very unlikely that the commanders employed against Demetrius originally received any such instructions. Their object was to defeat him; but this for a considerable time they failed to do, suffering defeat themselves in several engagements (Justin, l. s. c.).

3. Who went and smote the host of Demetrius, and took him.] There is no reason to doubt the statement of Justin, that Demetrius was deceived by a pretence of negotiations and so captured ("pacis simulatione deceptus capitur"). An attack on his army seems however to have been made at the same time with his own seizure, and the result was its complete defeat (Justin, xxxviii. 9).

he was put in ward.] At first Demetrius was put in fetters of iron (Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, § 17), and carried about through the provinces which had embraced his cause, to excite ridicule (Justin, xxxvi. 1); but afterwards he received courteous and even kindly treatment. He was assigned a residence in Hyrcania, where he was maintained as a prince, and given a wife in the person of Rhodogune, Mithridates' daughter (Appian, 'Syriaca,' § 67).

§ 2. The Prosperity of Judæa under Simon.

4–15. A short period of tranquillity followed the recovery of the Acra, and the departure of Demetrius on his eastern expedition. Tryphon was sufficiently occupied in Syria proper to make no further attempt against Judæa. The Hellenizing party among the Jews was paralysed by the loss of the Acra and of Gazara, and by the firmness with which Simon governed the land. Antiochus, the brother of Demetrius, had not yet quitted his obscure retreat at Sida, and when he did so was for some time engaged in contest with Tryphon. Thus "the land was quiet in the days of Simon." From B.C. 141, when the Acra was recovered, to B.C. 138–7, when Cendebæus made his invasion (ch. xv. 40), the land rested. It is this period especially which the author here describes.

4. the land . . . was quiet all the days of Simon.] This is contradicted by the later narrative (ch. xv. 38–41; ch. xvi. 1–19), and must be viewed as a rhetorical exaggeration. Simon's reign was on the whole quiet, compared with those of Judas and Jonathan, and again of John Hyrcanus; but it was not a time of uninterrupted tranquillity.

for he sought.] Rather, "And he sought."

5. he took Joppe for an haven.] I.e. "with the view and object of making it a haven." The "ships" on Simon's monument at Modeïn (ch. xiii. 29), the employment of Joppa as a haven, and the opening of trade between that port and "the isles of the sea," are to be connected together. Regarding war as over,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 140. for an haven, and made an entrance to the isles of the sea,

6 And enlarged the bounds of his nation, and recovered the country,

7 And gathered together a great number of captives, and had the dominion of Gazara, and Bethsura, and the tower, out of the which he took all uncleanness, neither was there any that resisted him.

8 Then did they till their ground in peace, and the earth gave her increase, and the trees of the field their fruit.

9 The ancient men sat all in the streets, communing together of ‖ good things, and the young men put on glorious and warlike apparel. B. C. cir. 140.

‖ Or, the wealth of the land.

10 He provided victuals for the cities, and set in them all manner of munition, so that his honourable name was renowned unto the end of the world.

11 He made peace in the land, and Israel rejoiced with great joy:

12 For [b]every man sat under his vine and his fig tree, and there was none to fray them:

[b] 1 Kings 4. 25. Mic. 4. 4. Zech. 3. 10.

Simon turned himself to the works of peace, which were most congenial to his temperament, and determined on the encouragement of trade and commerce. He has been called the "Solomon" of the Asmonæan kingdom (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 363); and certainly in this respect he imitated the example of his great predecessor and prototype (1 Kings ix. 26–28; 2 Chr. viii. 17, 18; ix. 10, 21).

the isles of the sea.] By "the isles of the sea" (Heb. iyyêy hayyâm) we must understand the islands and sea-coasts of Europe generally (compare ch. vi. 29; xv. 11)—by "making an entrance to them," allowing them freely to import their commodities into his country.

6. enlarged the bounds of his nation.] The reference is probably to the recovery of Gazara and the Acra (ch. xiii. 43–51) and to the occupation of Joppa by Judæans (ib. 11). Otherwise Simon does not appear to have made any conquests.

7. And gathered together a great number of captives.] I.e. he redeemed from slavery many Jewish captives—probably, prisoners of war—and restored them to their native country. Compare the boast of Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 8).

had the dominion of Gazara.] Rather, "made himself master of Gazara." (Cf. ch. xiii. 43–7.)

and Bethsura.] Compare v. 33, and see also ch. xi. 65–66. From the latter passage it appears that the capture of Beth-sura was effected by Simon during Jonathan's lifetime.

and the tower.] The Acra, or citadel of Jerusalem. (See ch. xiii. 49–51.)

neither was there any that resisted him.] This is another exaggeration (see the comment on v. 4). Antiochus of Sida resisted him (ch. xv. 27–39); Cendebæus resisted him (ib. vv. 40, 41; ch. xvi. 1–10), and his own son-in-law, Ptolemy the son of Abubus, not only resisted him but murdered him at a banquet (ch. xvi. 11–16).

8. Then did they till their ground in peace.] Agriculture, neglected during the time of war and disturbance, once more flourished; the earth brought forth abundance both of grain and fruit.

the trees of the field.] Vines and olives, especially, figs and pomegranates also to some extent. (Compare Deut. viii. 8; Josh. xxiv. 13; 1 Sam. viii. 14; 2 Kings xviii. 32; Hag. ii. 19; &c.) The fruit crop was reckoned by the Jews quite as important as the crop of grain.

9. The ancient men sat all in the streets.] The prophecy of Zechariah was fulfilled, which said: "There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, every man with his staff in his hand for very age" (Zech. viii. 4). Grimm rightly observes that the author has this text in his mind.

the young men put on glorious and warlike apparel.] The young men wore for display "the accoutrements in which they had won their country's freedom" (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 364).

10. set in them all manner of munition.] Literally, "made them all into vessels of strength." The fortification of the cities seem to be intended. (Compare ch. xiii. 10, 33, 48, 52; xiv. 33, 34.)

his honourable name was renowned unto the end of the world.] I.e. "far and wide." Simon attracted attention at Rome (vv. 16, 24, and ch. xv. 16–24), at Sparta (vv. 16–23), in Asia Minor (ch. xv. 23), in Rhodes, Cyprus, and Cyrene (ibid.). No prince of the Asmonean family had as yet been so generally famous.

12. every man sat under his vine and his fig tree.] Compare 1 Kings iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10. The phrase was used to

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 140.

13 Neither was there any left in the land to fight against them: yea, the kings themselves were overthrown in those days.

14 Moreover he strengthened all those of his people that were brought low: the law he searched out; and every contemner of the law and wicked person he took away.

15 He beautified the sanctuary, and multiplied the vessels of the temple. B. C. cir. 140.

16 Now when it was heard at Rome, and as far as Sparta, that Jonathan was dead, they were very sorry.

17 But as soon as they heard that his brother Simon was made high priest in his stead, and ruled the country, and the cities therein:

express perfect tranquillity and security. It came home to each Jew who was wont to sit under the shadow of "the vine which overspread his own house, and the fig-tree in his own garden" (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' l. s. c.).

there was none to fray them.] Rather, "to affright them." But the word "fray" had this meaning, when our translation was made. (See Deut. xxviii. 26; Jer. vii. 33; Zech. i. 21; Ecclus. xxii. 20.)

13. Neither was there any left in the land to fight against them.] See the introductory paragraph to this section.

the kings themselves were overthrown in those days.] The writer refers probably to the defeat and captivity of Demetrius, who was made prisoner by the Parthians in B.C. 138, and the reverses suffered by Tryphon in B.C. 138–7. (See ch. xv. 10–37.)

14. he strengthened all those of his people that were brought low.] Literally, "all the humble of his people." By "the humble" are meant, not the pious generally, but the oppressed and those of low estate.

the law he searched out.] I.e. studied its full meaning, with a view to its better observance. Compare the Sept. version of Ps. civ. 45, where our translators give "keep his laws."

every contemner of the law and wicked person he took away.] Like his predecessors (ch. ii. 24, 44; iii. 5, 8; vii. 6, 24, &c.), Simon acted with severity against all those who neglected the observance of the law, and assimilated themselves to the heathen, rooting them out (ἐξαίρων), i.e. either putting them to death, or banishing them from the land. Some modern critics regret this "intolerance;" but it was in accordance with the commands given by God to Moses; and a gentler policy would, in all probability, have produced the effacement of the nation.

15. He . . . multiplied the vessels of the temple.] On the numerous "vessels" required in the temple service, see 1 Kings vii. 38–50; 2 Chr. iv. 11–22; Ezra i. 9–11, viii. 25–30. It was always regarded as an act of piety to "multiply" them.

§ 3. Simon has friendly Communication with Sparta and Rome.

16–24. From his general sketch of the prosperity of Judæa under Simon, in which "the prosaic historian of fifty (?) years later warms almost into poetry" (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 363), the author proceeds to other points which reflected credit and glory upon his hero. In the present section he tells of two embassies which he received—the sequel of the steps taken by his brother, Jonathan (ch. xii. 1–18)—one from Sparta and the other from Rome, unequal no doubt in value, but both of them giving him dignity in the eyes of surrounding nations. The respective ambassadors brought with them documents renewing the leagues which were recognised as subsisting between the nations which they represented and the Jews.

16. at Rome, and as far as Sparta.] Though Sparta was geographically so much nearer to Judæa than Rome, it was practically more remote. Rome was in constant communication with Syria and Palestine. Her agents were everywhere. The little state of Sparta had, on the contrary, no agents, and but rare communication with any foreign country.

they were very sorry.] A diplomatic sorrow is intended. They expressed themselves as deeply grieved.

17. as soon as they heard.] Grammatically, both the Romans and the Spartans should be spoken of; but there is a difficulty in supposing that the Romans really acted in the manner here stated. It was not their practice to volunteer communications with new rulers of countries in alliance with them. Their diplomacy was more reserved. They waited till the new ruler made overtures to them and asked for a renewal of alliance (Polyb. xxxi. 14, xxxiii. 16; Liv. xlii. 6, &c.). Perhaps the writer has misplaced the conclusion of the Roman treaty, which in point of fact did not precede, but followed, the embassy of Numenius (v. 24).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 140.

18 They wrote unto him in tables of brass, to renew the friendship and league which they had made with Judas and Jonathan his brethren:

19 Which writings were read before the congregation at Jerusalem.

20 And this is the copy of the letters that the Lacedemonians sent; The rulers of the Lacedemonians, with the city, unto [c] Simon the high priest, and the elders, and priests, and residue of the people of the Jews, our brethren, send greeting:

[c] See ch. 12. 6.

21 The ambassadors that were sent unto our people certified us of your glory and honour: wherefore we were glad of their coming,

22 And did register the things that they spake in the [‖] council of the people in this manner; Numenius son of Antiochus, and Antipater son of Jason, the Jews' ambassadors, came unto us to renew the friendship they had with us.

B. C. cir. 140.

[‖] Or, publick records.

23 And it pleased the people to entertain the men honourably, and to put the copy of their ambassage in publick records, to the end the people of the Lacedemonians might have a memorial thereof: furthermore we have written a copy thereof unto Simon the high priest.

24 After this Simon sent Numenius to Rome with a great shield of gold of a thousand pound weight, to confirm the league with them.

18. They wrote unto him in tables of brass.] Compare ch. viii. 22, and comment ad loc.

the . . . league . . . made with Judas.] See ch. viii. 22–30.

and Jonathan.] The Senate had perhaps received Jonathan's ambassadors (ch. xii. 16) before his death, and consented to a renewal of the treaty of alliance with him.

20. this is the copy of the letters that the Lacedemonians sent.] Rather, "of the letter." (See comment on ch. xii. 5.) Here again we have not a copy of the actual Greek original, but a Greek translation of the Hebrew version of that original. With this qualification, the document would seem to be an authentic one. It may, perhaps, be abbreviated.

The rulers of the Lacedemonians.] In the time of Onias the Spartans had still their two kings of the two ancient royal houses, Areus (ch. xii. 20) belonging to the house of the Agidæ. After the old hereditary monarchy came to an end (B.C. 220), the state was ruled for a time by "tyrants"—e.g. Lycurgus, Machanides, Nabis. After the death of Nabis in B.C. 192, the "rulers" of the state were the Ephors.

with the city.] I.e. "the people." Excepting when she was under tyrants, Sparta had always an assembly of the people, which exercised a large, though undefined, authority. (Compare v. 23.)

unto Simon the high priest, and the elders.] The "elders" of this passage correspond to the "senate of the people" mentioned in ch. xii. 6.

our brethren.] This is emphatic. (Compare ch. xii. 7, 21.) The Spartans continue to claim a close kinship with the Jews, notwithstanding the entire absence of any foundation for the claim. (See the comment on ch. xii. 21.)

21. The ambassadors that were sent.] I.e. Numenius and Antipater, who were sent to Sparta and Rome by Jonathan in B.C. 144 (ch. xii. 16, 17).

certified us of your glory and honour.] I.e. told of the flourishing condition of Judæa under Jonathan at the time when he sent the embassy. (See ch. xi. 60–74; ch. xii. 1, 2.)

22. And did register the things that they spake in the council of the people.] Rather, "And registered among the decrees of the people the things that they spake." For βουλὴ in the sense of "decree," see Andoc. p. 9. l. 4; p. 23, l. 15, &c. The sense of "council" is not suitable here, more especially as the word is in the plural.

Numenius, &c.] See ch. xii. 16, and the comment ad loc.

23. the copy of their ambassage.] Literally, "the copy of their words."

in publick records.] Rather, "in the public records" (literally, "in the appointed books of the people").

24. with a great shield of gold.] The practice of courting the favour of the Roman state by rich gifts was very common at the time whereof our author treats. The usual form which the gifts took was that of a crown of gold, as mentioned in the comment on ch. viii. 14; but occasionally this form was varied, and a golden shield, or some other article of value, substituted. The golden shields, often presented to the Roman emperors as gifts of honour, formed a sort of continuance of the ancient practice (Suet. 'Vit. Calig.' § 16;

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 140. 25 Whereof when the people heard, they said, What thanks shall we give to Simon and his sons?

26 For he and his brethren and the house of his father have established Israel, and chased away in fight their enemies from them, and confirmed their liberty.

27 So then they wrote it in tables of brass, which they set upon pillars in mount Sion: and this is the copy of the writing; The eighteenth day of the month Elul, in the hundred threescore and twelfth year, being the third year of Simon the high priest, B. C. 140.

28 At ‖Saramel in the great con-

‖ Or, Jerusalem, peradventure by corruption and transposition of letters; or, as some think, the common hall where they met to consult of matters of estate of a thousand pound weight.] If the Attic mina is intended, our "pound" may be regarded as fairly representing it; but if the Hebrew gold maneh is meant, the weight would be nearly double. Josephus, in a passage ('A. J.' xiv. 8, § 5) which probably treats of the present embassy of Numenius, though by some blunder he has referred it to a later date, gives the value of the shield as fifty thousand aurei, or nearly 53,000*l.*

Jul. Capit. 'Vit. Anton. Pii,' § 5; Trebell. Poll. 'Vit. Claud.' § 3, &c.).

§ 4. The Jews set up a Memorial of Simon's Acts and Honours in the Temple.

25–49. The culminating honour paid to Simon proceeded from his own nation. Roused to an unwonted enthusiasm by his important successes (ch. xiii. 43–50; ch. xiv. 33) and by the acknowledgments of his power and greatness which they saw made by foreign countries (ch. xiv. 16–23; 38–40), they gathered themselves together, and held a great assembly (v. 28), in which it was resolved that there should be set up within the precincts of the sanctuary a document, engraved on a brazen tablet, containing a record of his glorious deeds and honours, recognising him as their prince and leader, conferring on him absolute power (vv. 42–45), and making the high priesthood hereditary in his family (vv 25, 41, 49). So far as we know, such an honour had never been paid by the Jews to any of their rulers before: it was in its conception rather Greek than Hebrew, and shewed how Hellenic civilisation affected even those most opposed to it; but it fitly crowned the edifice of Simon's fame, indicating to after generations the exalted, and indeed unique, position which this particular Maccabee prince held in the estimation of his countrymen.

25. What thanks shall we give to Simon and his sons?] The important fact, that now for the second time only in the life of the nation a hereditary monarchy was set up, is just hinted at in these first words—by the mention of Simon's "sons"—as it is again in the closing words of the narrative (v. 49). See Ewald's 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 336, note [6].

26. he and his brethren and the house of his father.] Compare ch. xiii. 3; xvi. 2.

27. they wrote it in tables of brass.] The Romans had familiarised the Jews with inscriptions on bronze tablets (ch. viii. 22; xiv. 18), and they now set up such an inscription themselves. In Assyria the material had been used, both for sculptures and for inscriptions, at a much earlier date ('Transactions of the Society of Bibl. Archæology,' vol. vii. pp. 84–88). The Greeks employed it for inscriptions, at any rate from the time of the Persian War (Herod. ix. 81; Pausan. v. 23, § 1). The Romans inscribed their treaties upon bronze tablets from the first year of the Republic (Polyb. iii. 22, § 1; 26, § 1).

upon pillars.] The στήλαι of the original are scarcely "pillars." They represent rather those upright flat stones which the Greeks and Romans were accustomed to erect, either as funeral monuments, or as memorials of various other kinds.

in mount Sion.] I.e. the Temple hill, as constantly in this Book (ch. iv. 37, 60; v. 54; vii. 33). Compare v. 48.

The eighteenth day of . . . Elul.] Elul, the sixth month of the Jewish sacred year, corresponded with the latter part of August and the earlier portion of September. It was the last month of the Jewish civil year. The Elul of Ær. Seleuc. 172 would fall in the autumn of B.C. 140.

the third year of Simon.] Compare ch. xiii. 42.

28. At Saramel.] The word "Saramel" occurs here only. It is supposed by some to be the name of a place in Jerusalem where popular assemblies were held; but it scarcely seems possible that, if this were the case, we should find no other notice of it, either in the Bible, or in Josephus, or in the Talmud. Most commentators suppose a corruption, or rather a failure to understand the original Hebrew text on the part of the Greek translator. The original words are generally thought to have been either ba-hatsar 'am

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 140. gregation of the priests, and people, and rulers of the nation, and elders of the country, were these things notified unto us.

29 Forasmuch as oftentimes there have been wars in the country, wherein for the maintenance of their sanctuary, and the law, Simon the son of Mattathias, of the posterity of Jarib, together with his brethren, put themselves in jeopardy, and resisting the enemies of their nation did their nation great honour:

30 (For after that Jonathan, having gathered his nation together, and been their high priest, was added to his people,

B. C. 140.

31 Their enemies purposed to invade their country, that they might destroy it, and lay hands on the sanctuary:

32 At which time Simon rose up, and fought for his nation, and spent much of his own substance, and armed ‖the valiant men of his nation, and gave them wages,

‖ Or, the men of war.

33 And fortified the cities of Judea, together with Bethsura, that lieth upon the borders of Judea, where the ‖armour of the enemies

‖ Or, weapons.

El, "in the court of the people of God," or bash-sha'ar 'am 'El, "at the gate of the people of God"—i. e. "in the great court of the temple," or "at the great gate of the temple." Grimm, however, proposes a different explanation. The word belongs, he thinks, to the preceding verse, and represents the Hebrew hash-shar 'am 'El, "the prince of the people of God," which is no doubt a possible title of Simon. The preposition ἐν he supposes to have been inserted by a transcriber who thought hash-shar 'am 'El was the name of a place. On the whole, the explanation of Saramel (Asaramel in some MSS.) as hat-sar 'am El, which is Ewald's ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 336, note [5]), seems to be the best.

in the great congregation.] Rather, "in a great assembly." There is no article; and a political, rather than a religious, gathering is intended.

of the priests, and people, &c.] "Priests," "people," "rulers," "elders," do not form a very correct logical division; but it is easy to see that an enumeration which shall comprise the whole nation is meant. Had the order been, "the priests, the rulers, the elders, and the people"—i.e. the rest of the people—the laws of logic would have been fairly satisfied.

were these things notified unto us.] This meaning cannot be got out of the existing text; but it is likely to have been that of the original Hebrew, which the Greek translator misunderstood. (See Grimm's note on the passage.)

29. of the posterity of Jarib.] "Jarib" is a contracted form of "Joarib" (ch. ii. 1) which is itself a contraction of "Jehoiarib" (1 Chr. ix. 10). Jehoiarib was the head of the first out of the twenty-four "courses" of priests according to the arrangement of the priests made by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). The return of some priests of this "course" from the Babylonian captivity is attested, both by the author of Chronicles (1 Chr. ix. 10) and by Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 10; xii. 6, 19).

30. Jonathan . . . gathered his nation together.] The "gathering" is said to have been voluntary on the part of Jonathan's friends in ch. ix. 28. But he was no doubt cognizant of it and gave it his sanction.

and been their high priest.] Rather, "and been made their high priest."

was added to his people.] I.e. "died." Compare the expression in ch. ii. 69—"So he (Mattathias) died, and was gathered to his fathers." The verb is the same in both places.

31. Their enemies purposed to invade their country.] Compare ch. xiii. 1–20.

32. Simon . . . spent much of his own substance.] This had not been stated previously; but it is quite in accordance with the general spirit of liberality which pervades Simon's acts. (See ch. xiii. 17, 27–29; xiv. 7, &c.) We are not to suppose that he raised armies, like Crassus, from his private means, but that he used them to supplement the public funds which were at his disposal: supplying his troops with better arms, and higher pay, than would otherwise have been possible.

33. fortified the cities of Judea.] Compare ch. xiii. 33.

together with Bethsura.] See ch. xi. 65, 66; where Simon's capture of Bethsura, during his brother Jonathan's lifetime, is related.

that lieth upon the borders of Judea.] On the position of Bethsura (Beth-zur) in the border country of Judah and Edom, see the comment on ch. iv. 29. It would seem to have been recently made into an arsenal by the Syrians. Simon took it, garrisoned it with Jews, and strengthened its defences.

Digitized by Microsoft®

had been before; but he set a garrison of Jews there:

34 Moreover he fortified Joppe, which lieth upon the sea, and ‖ Gazara, that bordereth upon Azotus, where the enemies had dwelt before: but he placed Jews there, and furnished them with all things convenient for the reparation thereof.)

35 The people therefore, seeing the acts of Simon, and unto what glory he thought to bring his nation, made him their governor and chief priest, because he had done all these things, and for the justice and faith which he kept to his nation, and for that he sought by all means to exalt his people.

36 For in his time things prospered in his hands, so that the heathen were taken out of their country, and they also that were in the city of David in Jerusalem, who had made themselves a tower, out of which they issued, and polluted all about the sanctuary, and did much hurt ‖ in the holy place:

37 But he placed Jews therein, and fortified it for the safety of the country and the city, and raised up the walls of Jerusalem.

38 King Demetrius also [d] confirmed him in the high priesthood according to those things,

39 And made him one of his

B. C. cir. 140.

‖ Or, Gaza.

B C cir. 140.

‖ Or, unto religion.

[d] ch. 10. 20. & 11. 57.

34. Moreover he fortified Joppe.] Joppa had been taken by Jonathan in his war with Apollonius, the general of Demetrius II. (ch. x. 76). Simon had afterwards, in the lifetime of Jonathan, occupied the city, and placed a Jewish garrison in it (ch. xii. 33, 34). After his accession to the high priesthood and leadership of the nation, he had made Joppa an open port (ch. xiv. 5), and, probably at the same time, had fortified it.

and Gazara, that bordereth upon Azotus.] For the situation of Gazara, see the comment on ch. iv. 15. Its "bordering on Azotus" must be understood somewhat vaguely. Azotus was distant from it at least seventeen miles in a south-westerly direction. But it is possible that the territory of Azotus extended to a considerable distance inland, and that the land dependent on Azotus and that which belonged to Gazara were contiguous. Simon's conquest of Gazara is related in ch. xiii. 43–47. His fortification of it in ch. xiii. 48.

where the enemies had dwelt before.] Gazara appears in ch. iv. 15 (B.C. 165) as a place in the possession of the Syrians. It was fortified by Bacchides at the time (B.C. 169) when he was at war with Jonathan (ch. ix. 52). The Jews do not seem to have made any serious attempt to wrest it out of the hands of the Syrians until the siege by Simon in B.C. 142. It had then been in the hands of the Syrians for at least twenty-three years.

he placed Jews there.] Compare ch. xiii. 48—"He placed there such men as would keep the law."

35. The people . . . made him their governor and chief priest.] See ch. xiii. 8. Simon is first called "high priest" in the letter of Demetrius to him (ch. xiii. 36), but he seems to have been "appointed" by the people, and only "confirmed" in office by the Syrian monarch (see below, v. 38).

the . . . faith which he kept to his nation.] Fidelity to the promises which he made on the capture of Jonathan (ch. xiii. 5, 6).

36. the heathen were taken out of their country.] I.e. out of the Jews' country. (See ch. xiii. 47; xiv. 33.) The Syrian garrisons were entirely cleared out from the whole of Judæa.

they also that were in the city of David.] See ch. xiii. 48–51.

who . . . did much hurt in the holy place.] Rather, "did much hurt to its purity." The vicinity of idols and idol-altars, the sights and sounds connected with the idol-worship, such as music, dancing, and the smoke of idol-sacrifices, were felt to be a pollution to the purity of the Temple itself, from which it was impossible to shut them out.

37. he placed Jews therein and fortified it.] If Josephus is correct in his statement, that Simon destroyed the Acra and cut down the hill on which it stood (see the comment on ch. xiii. 52), we must regard that proceeding as an afterthought. It is evident that his first intention was to maintain the Acra for the better defence of the city.

38. Demetrius . . . confirmed him in the high priesthood.] Perhaps by the simple act of acknowledging him as High Priest in the formal letter which he addressed to him in B.C. 142 (ch. xiii. 36); perhaps in some more ceremonious way.

according to those things.] Or, "in conformity with those things." The rank and place of High Priest were suitable to one who had so greatly distinguished himself.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 140. friends, and honoured him with great honour.

[e] ch. 8. 20. & 12. 3. 40 For he had heard say, that [e] the Romans had called the Jews their friends and confederates and brethren; and that they had entertained the ambassadors of Simon honourably;

41 Also that the Jews and priests were well pleased that Simon should be their governor and high priest [f] ch. 4. 46. for ever, [f] until there should arise a faithful prophet;

42 Moreover that he should be their captain, and should take charge of the sanctuary, to set them over their works, and over the country, and over the armour, and over the fortresses, that, I say, he should take charge of the sanctuary;

B. C. cir. 140.

43 Beside this, that he should be obeyed of every man, and that all the writings in the country should be made in his name, and that [g] he should be clothed in purple, and wear gold:

[g] ch. 10. 20, 89. & 11. 58.

44 Also that it should be lawful for none of the people or priests to

39. And made him one of his friends.] Compare ch. xiii. 36.

40. For he had heard say, &c.] Though Rome as yet possessed not a rood of ground in Asia, her influence was enormous. Continual embassies were passing between the Senate and the kings and potentates of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, through which Rome, to a great extent, directed the course of events in the East as she thought best for her own interests. None of the states could afford to quarrel with the great power of the West, and the moment any community obtained her protection, or any prince her alliance, the respect of all the neighbouring states and princes was at once secured. We may gather from the present passage that Demetrius did not send his letter to Simon (ch. xiii. 36–40) until he knew that Numenius and Antipater had obtained favour at Rome.

the Romans had called the Jews their friends and confederates and brethren.] It is not likely that the Romans really called the Jews "their brethren," or that the ground of kinship was put forward in the negotiations with Rome, as it was in those with Sparta (ch. xii. 6, 7, 17, 21). The writer has carelessly used an unfit expression.

41. Also that the Jews and priests were well pleased.] The word "that" (ὅτι) is superfluous, and has probably crept in by the carelessness of a scribe, who had καὶ ὅτι before him in the preceding line. The verse is to be connected with v. 35. "The people made Simon their governor and chief priest" (v. 35)—not only so, but they made him "their governor and high priest for ever;" i.e. they established the governorship and high-priesthood in the family of Simon, to be his and his sons' in perpetuum.

until there should arise a faithful prophet.] During the entire period between Malachi and John the Baptist, it was recognised by the Jews themselves that they had no prophet. Arrangements for the civil government had to be made in the interval, and to be varied from time to time; but they were regarded as provisional, to be confirmed or altered by the next prophet, when he should arise. That a prophet would arise—a true prophet (πιστός)—was regarded as certain on account of Mal. iv. 5.

42. Moreover that he should be their captain.] Literally, "their general"—the commander of their armies. They placed the civil, the ecclesiastical, and the military authority in the same hands. Simon afterwards transferred the military authority to his sons (ch. xvi. 2, 3).

to set them over their works.] I.e. to assign their respective duties to all those employed in the Temple service.

and over the country, &c.] I.e. to assign offices generally, as those of district governors, judges, &c., those of keepers of arsenals, and those of commandants of fortresses. A universal power of appointment seems to be intended.

43. that all the writings in the country should be made in his name.] Rather, "all the contracts," or "all the legal instruments" (see ch. xiii. 42). It appears by the Babylonian contract tablets, that agreements, in order to be valid, had to be dated, and the only known mode of dating was by the regnal years of the kings. In Judæa the practice had been to date by the Seleucid era (as in 1 Macc. i. 10, 54, ii. 70, &c.; 2 Macc. i. 7, xi. 33, &c.); but, from the first year of Simon, that system of a double date was introduced, of which we have a specimen in this chapter (v. 27). Henceforth all Jewish contracts mentioned both the Seleucid year and also the year of the High Priest. The regulation was a mark of sovereignty.

that he should be clothed in purple, and wear gold.] Compare ch. viii. 14; x. 20, 62; xi. 58

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 140.

break any of these things, or to gainsay his words, or to gather an assembly in the country without him, or to be clothed in purple, or wear a buckle of gold:

45 And whosoever should do otherwise, or break any of these things, he should be punished.

46 Thus it liked all the people to deal with Simon, and to do as hath been said.

47 Then Simon accepted hereof, and was well pleased to be high priest, and captain and governor of the Jews and priests, and to defend them all.

48 So they commanded that this writing should be put in tables of brass, and that they should be set up within the compass of the sanctuary in a conspicuous place;

B. C. cir. 140

49 Also that the copies thereof should be laid up in the treasury, to the end that Simon and his sons might have them.

CHAPTER XV.

4 Antiochus desireth leave to pass through Judea, and granteth great honours to Simon and the Jews. 16 The Romans write to divers kings and nations to favour the Jews. 27 Antiochus quarrelleth with Simon, 38 and sendeth some to annoy Judea.

MOREOVER Antiochus son of Demetrius the king sent cir. 139.

44. wear a buckle of gold.] See the comment on ch. x. 89.

45. he should be punished.] Literally, "he should be liable to punishment."

47. Simon . . . was well pleased to be high priest, and captain and governor of the Jews.] Literally, "high priest, and general, and ethnarch of the Jews." The word "ethnarch" is unusual. Etymologically it means the "ruler of a nation." Practically, it was applied only to petty sovereigns, as to Simon on this occasion (comp. Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 6, § 6), to Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great (ib. xvii. 13, § 4), to Aretas (2 Cor. xii. 32), and a few others. Though not necessarily implying independent sovereignty, it was an advance beyond the ἄρχων, which had been the title of the earlier Maccabee princes (ch. ii. 66; ix. 30). The head of the Jews in Alexandria had long borne the title (Joseph. 'A. J.' xiv. 7, § 2; xix. 5, § 2, &c.).

and to defend them all.] Rather, "and to be over them all."

48. they commanded that this writing should be put in tables of brass.] Compare v. 27, and comment ad loc.

within the compass of the sanctuary.] I.e. within the wall that enclosed the sanctuary. Compare ch. iv. 60, vi. 62, x. 11; 2 Macc. vi. 4, &c.

in a conspicuous place.] It is impossible to say what this place was; but clearly one is intended which every priest might have examined at the time when our author wrote. This is a strong argument in favour of the authenticity of the document. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 336, note [6].)

49. Also that the copies . . . should be laid up in the treasury.] Rather, "a copy." The plural is used on account of the antecedent ("tables") being in the plural. Τὰ ἀντίγραφα is literally "their counterparts."

to the end that Simon and his sons might have them.] See the comment on v. 25. Simon's sons were as much interested as himself in a decree which made the monarchy, and the high priesthood, hereditary (v. 41).

CHAPTER XV.

§ 1. Antiochus Sidetes claims the Syrian Crown, and seeks the Support of Simon.

1-9. During the absence of Demetrius in the eastern provinces the civil war in Syria had slumbered. Tryphon held Antioch and most of Syria proper; but Cleopatra maintained her husband's cause from Seleucia, and was still unsubdued. She felt herself, however, insecure; and after a time invited her husband's brother, Antiochus of Sida (Sidetes), to her aid. Antiochus readily embraced her overtures, and Tryphon having become unpopular through his luxury and tyranny, he was able to take the offensive, and drive Tryphon out of Syria (v. 11). First, however, he sent an embassy to Simon with the proposals contained in vv. 2-9.

1. Antiochus son of Demetrius the king.] It is not quite clear whether the author rightly comprehended the relationship of this new Antiochus to his predecessors. He was not the son of Demetrius II., as we should naturally have imagined from the present passage, but his brother (App. 'Syriac.' § 68; Justin, xxxvi. 1; Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, § 18, &c.), and the son of the former Demetrius, of whom our author speaks in chs. viii.-x. He is distinguished

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 139. letters from the isles of the sea unto Simon the priest and prince of the Jews, and to all the people;

2 The contents whereof were these: King Antiochus to Simon the high priest and prince of his nation, and to the people of the Jews, greeting:

3 Forasmuch as certain pestilent men have usurped the kingdom of our fathers, and my purpose is to challenge it again, that I may restore it to the old estate, and to that end have gathered a multitude of foreign soldiers together, and prepared ships of war; B. C. cir. 139

4 My meaning also being to go through the country, that I may be avenged of them that have destroyed it, and made many cities in the kingdom desolate:

5 Now therefore I confirm unto thee all the oblations which the kings before me granted thee, and whatsoever gifts besides they granted.

6 I give thee leave also to coin from the other Antiochi by the epithet Sidetes, which probably meant "of Sida," a Pamphylian town where he was brought up (Porphyry). On his coins he takes the title of Euergetes, "the Benefactor." He seems to have held the throne from B.C. 139 to B.C. 128, when he was defeated and slain by the Parthians.

sent letters.] Rather, "a letter." See note on ch. xii. 5.

from the isles of the sea.] Antiochus seems to have been at Rhodes when Cleopatra's invitation reached him (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 68). It is probable that among the first steps which he took was the dispatch of an embassy to Simon.

Simon the . . . prince of the Jews.] Literally, "the ethnarch." (See the comment on ch. xiv. 47.)

2. King Antiochus.] If we may accept this letter of Sidetes as genuine, it would seem that he took the royal title from the first (cf. v. 3), thus setting himself up as a rival, not only to Tryphon, but also to Demetrius, who was not taken captive by the Parthians until at least a year later (see Clinton's 'F. H.' vol. iii. p. 346). Our information is very scanty with respect to the Seleucid monarchs, and to some extent contradictory.

3. certain pestilent men.] Compare ch. x. 61. The phrase seems to be used here as a periphrasis for the usurper, Tryphon. Compare the ordinary Greek idiom, οἱ περὶ Σωκράτους for Σωκράτης.

the kingdom of our fathers.] Sidetes could trace his descent through six ancestors, who had all been kings, up to Seleucus Nicator, the companion of Alexander. He had a clear hereditary right to the throne, in succession to his elder brother, Demetrius. Tryphon had no claim of this kind, being a mere upstart.

I . . . have gathered a multitude of foreign soldiers together.] Any one with a name and a sufficient supply of the "sinews of war," could at this time easily collect a strong force of mercenaries, chiefly Greeks, prepared to shed their blood in his cause. Sidetes, probably supplied with money by Cleopatra, had succeeded in gathering together, while still at Rhodes, a considerable force of this kind.

and prepared ships of war.] "Ships of war" were a matter of absolute necessity to a pretender who started from Rhodes (see the comment on v. 1), and had to convey his troops from that island to the mainland. The first object of Sidetes was to join his forces to those of Cleopatra at Seleucia.

4. My meaning . . . being to go through the country.] Rather, "to disembark in the country," i.e. to invade it from the sea. No other course was open to the young prince. Like Demetrius I., he had to throw himself upon the coast of Syria, with such forces as he could muster, and to risk the result. The port of Seleucia was open to him; and it is probable that he made his landing there.

5. I confirm unto thee all the oblations.] The reading is doubtful. The Alexandrian Codex has ἀφέματα for ἀφαιρέματα; and ἀφέματα is the word used in the previous passages to which this verse seems to refer (ch. x. 28; xiii. 37). If we adopt this reading, we must translate, "all the exemptions" or "immunities." Ἀφαιρέματα may, however, be correct; but it can scarcely mean "oblations" in this connection. Translate rather "deductions."

they granted.] Rather, "they remitted." Former kings had "remitted," or excused, the payment of certain fixed charges which were of the nature of a tribute, and also certain customary "gifts." Antiochus confirms both remissions.

6. I give thee leave also to coin money.] Critics are divided on the question, whether Simon was the first of the Maccabee princes who struck coins, some extant specimens being referred by some to Judas Maccabeus, and others to Jonathan. But, on the whole,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 139. money for thy country with thine own stamp.

7 And as concerning Jerusalem and the sanctuary, let them be free; and all the armour that thou hast made, and fortresses that thou hast built, and keepest in thine hands, let them remain unto thee.

8 And if any thing be, or shall be, owing to the king, let it be forgiven thee from this time forth for evermore.

9 Furthermore, when we have obtained our kingdom, we will honour thee, and thy nation, and thy temple, with great honour, so that your honour shall be known throughout the world. B. C. cir. 139.

10 In the hundred threescore and fourteenth year went Antiochus into the land of his fathers: at which time all the forces came together unto him, so that few were left with Tryphon.

11 Wherefore being pursued by king Antiochus, he fled unto Dora, which lieth by the sea side:

it appears most probable that the archaic types, with which the entire series of Jewish coins confessedly commences, belong to the time of Simon, and were issued by him. These consist of shekels and half-shekels in silver, and of corresponding copper coins, bearing upon them such emblems as a pot or vase, a lily, a wheat-sheaf, a palm-tree, a fruit or fruits, with short legends in the archaic Hebrew character, which in the case of the silver coins read "shekel of Israel," or "half-shekel," and "Jerusalem the Holy"—in the case of the copper ones, "Year 4 of the redemption of Israel." The silver coins belong to three distinct years, and are marked as those of "Year 1," "Year 2," and "Year 3;" after which they cease and the copper begin, all of these belonging to "Year 4." It is remarkable that Simon did not put his name upon his coins, as did the later princes of the family, and it is to be noticed that his emblems were all of one class—"indications of the peace and plenty which he had ushered in" (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 363). The right of striking coins was regarded in the ancient world as essentially attaching to independent sovereignty.

7. the armour . . . and fortresses.] Compare ch. xiv. 10, 42.

8. if any thing be . . . owing.] If there be any outstanding claim for arrears due to the Syrian crown before the immunity of the land from taxation and tribute was formally granted.

§ 2. War of Antiochus with Tryphon.

10–14. The struggle between Antiochus Sidetes and Tryphon was but brief. Tryphon had alienated his subjects, and even his troops, by his excessive luxury and his caprices. Antiochus was no sooner landed on the Syrian coast than deserters from his rival's army flocked to his standard (v. 10). He was able at once to assume the offensive, and to challenge Tryphon to a trial of strength. According to Josephus ('A. J.' xiii. 7, § 2), the two armies met in a pitched battle, and Sidetes was victorious. Tryphon fled to Dor, or Dora, a maritime town situated south of Carmel, where he was besieged by Sidetes, who blockaded the place both by land and sea (v. 14). The end was not long in arriving. Tryphon broke the blockade and escaped to Orthosias (v. 37), whence he made his way to Apameia (Joseph. 'A. J.' l. s. c.), where he either committed suicide (Strab. xiv. 5, § 2) or was put to death (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 68).

10. In the hundred threescore and fourteenth year.] The 174th Seleucid year commenced in October B.C. 139, and terminated in October B.C. 138. Tryphon's death is placed by Clinton in November B.C. 139.

11. Dora, which lieth by the sea side.] Dora, "which lieth by the sea side," is almost certainly Dor, an old Phœnician settlement (Plin. 'H. N.' v. 17; Steph. Byz. ad voc.), on the coast of Palestine, between Cæsarea and the foot of Carmel. Dor had its own king in the time of Joshua (Josh. xii. 23), who was one of those "smitten" by him. In the partition of the territory it was assigned to Manasseh (ib. xvii. 11), but remained in the possession of the old inhabitants, paying a tribute (Judg. i. 27, 28). Solomon placed one of his "purveyors" in the "region of Dor" (1 Kings iv. 11). Tiglath-Pileser conquered the city about B.C. 730 ('Ancient Monarchies,' vol. ii. p. 398). Dora is reasonably identified with the modern Tantura, a village of about thirty houses, wholly constructed of ancient materials, and occupying the position indicated, about nine miles north of Cæsarea, and fifteen from the southern foot of Carmel. In the latter part of the modern name we have probably a corruption of Dora. Frontinus says ('Stratagem.' ii. 13) that Tryphon, as he fled from Antiochus, scattered money along his line of route, and thus succeeded in delaying the horsemen who had been sent to pursue and capture him.

B. C. cir. 139.

12 For he saw that troubles came upon him all at once, and that his forces had forsaken him.

13 Then camped Antiochus against Dora, having with him an hundred and twenty thousand men of war, and eight thousand horsemen.

14 And when he had compassed the city round about, and joined ships close to the town on the sea side, he vexed the city by land and by sea, neither suffered he any to go out or in.

15 In the mean season came Numenius and his company from Rome, having letters to the kings and countries; wherein were written these things: B. C. cir. 139.

16 Lucius, consul of the Romans, unto king Ptolemee, greeting:

17 The Jews' ambassadors, our friends and confederates, came unto us to renew the old friendship and league, being sent from Simon the high priest, and from the people of the Jews:

18 [a]And they brought a shield of gold of a thousand pound. [a] ch. 14. 24.

19 We thought it good therefore to write unto the kings and countries, that they should do them no harm, nor fight against them, their

12. his forces had forsaken him.] Justin says that the favour which had greeted him when his power was new, soon passed away (xxxvi. 1).

13. an hundred and twenty thousand . . . eight thousand.] These numbers are probably exaggerated. They exceed all that have occurred previously, and are far greater than would have been needed for the blockade of a small town like Dor.

14. and joined ships close to the town on the sea side.] Rather, "and his ships had completed the circuit on the sea side." The object was to invest the place completely.

§ 3. Return of Numenius from Rome, and Result of his Embassy.

15-24. The valuable gift which Numenius took to Rome not only obtained him an early audience, but secured the complete success of his mission. The Jews were distinctly acknowledged as friends and allies of the Romans; and at the same time a circular letter was written and sent to all the states and monarchs regarded as friendly to Rome in Greece, Western Asia, and East Africa, requiring them to abstain from all acts of hostility towards Simon, and further, to surrender to him all Jewish refugees whom he might require to be given up. A copy of the letter was entrusted to Numenius, to be placed in Simon's hands, that he might take action accordingly.

15. came Numenius . . . from Rome.] Compare ch. xiv. 24, where the embassy of Numenius is mentioned.

having letters to the kings.] The writer probably does not mean that the Romans entrusted the twenty-four copies of their circular letter to Numenius, to be delivered by him, or dispatched by Simon to their various destinations, but only that they sent by him "a letter" (ἐπιστολάς), which was addressed to numerous kings and countries. The "kings and countries" are enumerable in verses 22, 23.

16. Lucius, consul of the Romans.] The "Lucius" intended is probably L. Calpurnius Piso, who was consul, together with M. Popillius Lænas, in B.C. 139. The ordinary lists, it is true, give his prænomen as "Cneius," but incorrectly, as has been shewn by Dr. Westcott ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 148). It is curious, however, to find a Roman consul designated by his prænomen only, as also to find a document running in the name of one consul alone; and the conclusion is forced upon us that we have not an exact transcript of the circular letter sent, or even a correct translation of it. Still, there is no reason to doubt that the matter of the letter is correctly given.

unto king Ptolemee.] The letter addressed to the King of Egypt is taken as a specimen, sufficiently representing the remainder. The Ptolemy of the time was Ptolemy VIII.—known as Ptolemy Physcon, and also as Ptolemy Euergetes II.—who had been joint-king with his brother, Philometor, from B.C. 169 to 165, and reigned as sole king from B.C. 146 to B.C. 117.

17. to renew the old friendship and league.] I.e. the friendship and league made with Judas Maccabeus in B.C. 161-0. (See ch. viii. 17-30.)

18. they brought a shield of gold.] See ch. xiv. 24.

19. that they should do them no harm.] Literally, "that they should not seek their hurt."

their cities or countries.] Rather, "their cities or country."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 139. cities, or countries, nor yet aid their enemies against them.

20 It seemed also good to us to receive the shield of them.

21 If therefore there be any pestilent fellows, that have fled from their country unto you, deliver them unto Simon the high priest, that he may punish them according to their own law. B. C. cir. 139.

22 The same things wrote he likewise unto Demetrius the king, and Attalus, to ‖Ariarathes, and Arsaces, ‖ Or, Arathes.

23 And to all the countries, and to ‖Sampsames, and the Lacedemonians, and to Delus, and Myndus, and Sicyon, ‖ Or, Sampsaces. Lat. Lampsacus.

nor yet aid their enemies against them.] Literally, "nor yet aid those who make war upon them."

20. It seemed . . . good to us to receive the shield.] Reception of the present brought by envoys was considered to bind the recipient to give a favourable answer to their requests. Rome, in the great majority of cases, kept to this understanding, but with an occasional departure from it. Very recently she had accepted a golden figure of Victory from Tryphon, and had melted it into a figure of the murdered Antiochus, placing his name upon it as though he had been the giver, and declining to acknowledge any obligation to Tryphon (Diod. Sic. vol. x. p. 88; Ed. Bipont.).

21. pestilent fellows, that have fled from their country unto you.] The severe measures of Simon against the Hellenizing faction (ch. xiv. 14) had evidently caused many Jews to betake themselves to voluntary exile. Numenius must have requested an exertion of the influence of Rome to force these exiles back upon their own country. Such an extradition of political offenders, though not unprecedented, was very unusual. It may be doubted whether many of the "kings and countries" addressed by the Romans acted upon the instructions here given to them.

22. The same things wrote he likewise unto Demetrius.] One of the circular letters was addressed to Demetrius II., who was regarded as the legitimate king of Syria, and whose capture by the Parthians had either not taken place, or at any rate was not known at Rome, when the circular letters were written. According to Clinton ('F. H.' vol. iii. p. 346) Demetrius was not made prisoner till Nov. B.C. 138. The letters were written in B.C. 139. (See comment on v. 16.)

and Attalus.] Attalus II. is no doubt intended. He was still king of Pergamus when the letters were written, not having been succeeded by his nephew, Attalus III., till B.C. 138. The Pergamene dynasty was connected with Rome by peculiarly close terms of alliance.

to Ariarathes.] Ariarathes V. (Philopator) was king of Cappadocia from B.C. 162 to B.C. 131. He "maintained the alliance between Cappadocia and Rome with great fidelity" ('Manual of Ancient History,' p. 300), and was a man of pure and blameless character. The Romans could count with a near approach to certainty on his compliance with their wishes.

and Arsaces.] It is surprising to find it stated that a letter was addressed at this time to Arsaces, the Parthian monarch, who was absolutely and entirely independent of the Romans, and was scarcely likely to pay the very slightest attention to their requests. As Grimm observes, the letter, if really written, must have been wholly different in tone from those addressed to the other monarchs. But our author's testimony, entirely unsupported as it is, can scarcely be regarded as sufficient to establish the fact—antecedently most improbable—that Arsaces was addressed upon the subject. The Arsaces intended would be Mithridates I., the opponent of Demetrius. (Cf. ch. xiv. 2, 3.)

23. to Sampsames.] It is quite uncertain what country is intended here. The Vulgate gives "Lampsacus;" but Lampsacus was not at this time an independent state, much less one that would be likely to be given the foremost place in such a list as the present. Grimm's conjecture of "Samsoun" —a name which first appears in the geography of Abulfeda (A.D. 1330)—is in the highest degree improbable.

Delus, and Myndus.] Delus, or rather Delos, the smallest of the Cyclades, had been given to Athens by the Romans in B.C. 167 (Polyb. xxx. 18, § 7). After the fall of Corinth, in B.C. 146, it became the centre of an extensive commerce, and (seemingly) regained its independence. Myndus was a small town in Caria, not far from Halicarnassus.

Sicyon.] Sicyon was one of the most important towns of the Peloponnese. It had been the place of meeting for the Council of the Achæan League (Polyb. v. 1, § 7; xxv. 1, § 5, &c.), and was a town of great strength (ib. xxx. 15, § 1). After the dissolution of the League, Sicyon, though really subject to Rome, was allowed the shadow of independence. (See Mommsen, 'Hist. of Rome,' vol. iii. p. 50, E. T.)

B. C. cir. 139. and Caria, and Samos, and Pamphylia, and Lycia, and Halicarnassus, and Rhodus, and ‖Phaselis, and Cos, and Side, and Aradus, and Gortyna, and Cnidus, and Cyprus, and Cyrene.

‖ Or, Basilis.

24 And the copy hereof they wrote to Simon the high priest.

‖ Gr. bringing his forces to it.

25 So Antiochus the king camped against Dora the second day, ‖assaulting it continually, and making engines, by which means he shut up Tryphon, that he could neither go out nor in.

B. C. cir. 139.

26 At that time Simon sent him two thousand chosen men to aid him; silver also, and gold, and much armour.

27 Nevertheless he would not re-

Caria, . . . and Pamphylia, and Lycia.] After a period of subjection to Rhodes, Caria and Lycia had regained their freedom by a decree of the Senate in B.C. 168 (Polyb. xxx. 5, § 12). Pamphylia, after its conquest by Achæus in B.C. 219 (Polyb. v. 77, § 1), was recovered to the Seleucid kingdom, but in the recent troubles may have become free.

Phaselis.] Phaselis was a city on the coast of Lycia, with an excellent port and a considerable trade, more especially in the early times (Herod. ii. 178). It was independent until B.C. 75, when the Romans deprived it of freedom as a punishment for the share which it had taken in the organised piracy of the time.

Side, and Aradus, and Gortyna.] Side, the city in which Antiochus Sidetes was brought up (see note on v. 1), was a Greek town belonging to Pamphylia, situated upon the coast between the Eurymedon and the Melas rivers. Like so many of the Hellenic maritime towns, it seems to have enjoyed a practical independence (Polyb. v. 73, § 4). Aradus was a Phœnician town, situated on the island now called Ruad, which lies off the Syrian coast, in lat. 34° 51′. It appears as independent in the war between Antiochus the Great and Ptolemy Philopator, B.C. 219 (Polyb. v. 68, § 7). Gortyna was one of the chief cities of Crete. Cnidus, Cyprus, and Cyrene are too well known to need identification or description.

24. the copy hereof.] The exact counterpart of the circular letter addressed to the Roman allies was sent to Simon, that he might know what injunctions had been laid upon them.

§ 4. ANTIOCHUS SIDETES CONTINUES HIS WAR WITH TRYPHON—HE PICKS A QUARREL WITH SIMON.

25–37. The siege of Dor continued, and Simon (according to Josephus) was of great service to Antiochus, by supplying him with money and provisions during the earlier part of the siege ('A. J.' xiii. 7, § 2). During this period he was in high favour with the Syrian king. But later on, in what seems to be called "the second siege" (v. 25), when success appeared to be certain, Sidetes changed his tone. The supplies of men and money which Simon sent him were rudely rejected (v. 27), and a demand was made on him for the payment of a thousand talents (more than 240,000*l.*), under the threat of immediate hostilities. The only alternative suggested was the surrender of Joppa, Gazara, and the Acra of Jerusalem, which Antiochus declared to be "cities of his realm" (v. 28) Simon was probably quite unable to pay the sum demanded, and he was quite determined not to surrender the fortresses, but, with the moderation which characterised him, he proposed a middle course—he would give a hundred talents (24,000*l.*) for the two conquered cities, albeit they belonged of right to Judæa, but he would give no more. The reply infuriated Sidetes, from whom Tryphon had recently escaped, having fled from Dor to Orthosias, a Phœnician city further to the north.

25. Antiochus the king camped against Dora the second day.] Rather, "for the second time," or "in the second siege"—ἐν τῇ δευτέρᾳ [πολιορκίᾳ]. Ewald has shewn that an interval of time is required between the events related in vv. 13, 14, and those now spoken of ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 338, note [4]).

assaulting it continually, and making engines.] The original intention was to reduce the place by blockade (v. 14); but this plan seems to have been found too tedious. In the "second siege" continual attacks were made upon the walls by military engines, which were supported by troops.

26. Simon sent him two thousand chosen men.] A small contingent, but nearly as many as had enabled Demetrius to quell the great insurrection in Antioch (ch. xi. 44–51), and exactly the number that had defied the entire "host" of Tryphon in Galilee (ch. xii. 47–51).

much armour.] Literally, "many vessels." The original no doubt had keli, which is a word of very wide significance.

27. Nevertheless he would not receive them.] There is not necessarily any contradiction between this statement and that of Josephus,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 139.

ceive them, but brake all the covenants which he had made with him afore, and became strange unto him.

28 Furthermore he sent unto him Athenobius, one of his friends, to commune with him, and say, Ye withhold Joppe and Gazara, with the tower that is in Jerusalem, which are cities of my realm.

29 The borders thereof ye have wasted, and done great hurt in the land, and got the dominion of many places within my kingdom.

30 Now therefore deliver the cities which ye have taken, and the tributes of the places, whereof ye have gotten dominion ‖ without the borders of Judea:

‖ Or, except the borders, &c.

31 Or else give me for them five hundred talents of silver; and for the harm that ye have done, and the tributes of the cities, other five hundred talents: if not, we will come and ‖ fight against you.

B. C. cir. 139.

‖ Or, subdue you in fight.

32 So Athenobius the king's friend came to Jerusalem: and when he saw the glory of Simon, and the cupboard of gold and silver plate, and his great attendance, he was astonished, and told him the king's message.

33 Then answered Simon, and said unto him, We have neither taken other men's land, nor holden that which appertaineth to others, but the inheritance of our fathers, which our enemies had wrongfully in possession a certain time.

34 Wherefore we, having oppor-that Simon supplied the troops of Antiochus with provisions and pay ('A. J.' xiii. 7, § 2), if we regard Josephus as speaking of the earlier, and our author of the later siege.

brake all the covenants which he had made with him afore.] Compare vv. 2–9. It is impossible to assign any other ground for Sidetes' change of policy, except his conviction that he was strong enough to hold his own without the help of the Jews, and his determination to bring Judæa back to the position of weakness and dependence which she had occupied in the more flourishing times of the Seleucid monarchy. This policy he pursued steadily during the remainder of his reign (ch. xv. 38–41, xvi. 5–10; Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 8).

became strange unto him.] Compare ch. xi. 53, where the same expression is used with respect to Demetrius II. and Jonathan.

28. Ye withhold Joppe.] Rather, "Ye hold." On the occupation of Joppa by Simon, see ch. xii. 33; xiv. 5, 34.

and Gazara.] Compare ch. xiii. 43–48; xiv. 34.

with the tower that is in Jerusalem.] I.e. the Acra, which Simon had taken after it had been held by the Syrians for twenty-six years. (See ch. xiii. 49–51.) Antiochus calls it a "city of his realm," since, though originally a mere fort, it had in course of time collected a cluster of houses around it.

29. The borders thereof ye have wasted.] Rather, "ye have made solitary." The expulsion of the Syrian garrisons, with their sympathizers, from Joppa (ch. xii. 34) and Gazara (ch. xiii. 47; xiv. 34), seems to be intended.

got the dominion of many places.] This is rhetorical amplification. The only other place that can be named is Ekron, which had been voluntarily ceded by Balas (ch. x. 89).

30. the tributes of the places.] I.e. the sums that would have been paid to the royal treasury as tribute by the cities occupied, if they had remained in the possession of the Syrians. The amount due is estimated later on (v. 31) at 500 talents!

32. the cupboard of gold and silver plate.] A "beaufet," or "sideboard," on which the gold and silver plate was displayed, is meant. An ostentatious display of magnificent drinking-vessels had been common in the East from Persian times (Xen. 'Cyrop.' viii. 8, § 18; Herod. ix. 80; Strab. xv. 3, § 19, &c.), and probably even from an earlier date. The practice spread from the Persians to the Greco-Macedonians, and seems to have passed from them to the Jews.

his great attendance.] Compare 2 Chr. ix. 4. Simon had evidently adopted a pomp and magnificence unknown to previous Maccabean princes, and unusual in a mere vassal king.

33. We have neither taken other men's land, &c.] Simon means to say that Joppa and Gazara, and still more the Acra, were ancient possessions of the Jewish nation, withheld from them for a time by force, but always really theirs. Consequently, they had but taken that which was their own. (See Josh. xvi. 3, xix. 46; 2 Chr. ii. 16, &c.)

B. C. cir. 139. tunity, hold the inheritance of our fathers.

35 And whereas thou demandest Joppe and Gazara, albeit they did great harm unto the people in our country, yet will we give an hundred talents for them. Hereunto Athenobius answered him not a word;

36 But returned in a rage to the king, and made report unto him of these speeches, and of the glory of Simon, and of all that he had seen: whereupon the king was exceeding wroth.

37 In the mean time fled Tryphon by ship unto Orthosias. B. C. cir. 139

38 Then the king made Cendebeus captain of the sea coast, and gave him an host of footmen and horsemen, 39 And commanded him to remove his host toward Judea: also he commanded him to build up ‖ Cedron, and to fortify the gates, and to war against the people; but as for the king himself, he pursued Tryphon. ‖ Or, Gedor.

40 So Cendebeus came to Jamnia, and began to provoke the people, and to invade Judea, and to take the people prisoners, and slay them.

35. will we give an hundred talents for them.] Simon was always ready to avert war by a moderate pecuniary sacrifice (ch. xiii. 19); but the demand for 1000 talents was preposterous. It is doubtful whether by any exertions he could have raised such a sum.

36. the king was exceeding wroth.] He had probably expected a submissive answer—the arrival of ambassadors with presents to deprecate his displeasure—the surrender, perhaps, of Joppa or Gazara, or both. He could certainly not have expected the restoration of the Acra. The boldness, however, and uncompromising plainness of Simon's reply offended him, and roused a feeling of anger, which led him to declare war at once against his recent ally.

37. Tryphon fled by ship unto Orthosias.] It is extremely difficult to keep up a blockade by sea. Rough weather deranges it, causing the blockading vessels to put to sea, or else to seek shelter in harbours. Again, a small boat easily slips past the vessels under cover of darkness. Thus Tryphon was able to elude his enemy, and remove from Dor to Orthosias. This latter city lay about 140 miles north of Dor, on the coast of Phœnicia, between Tripolis and the river Eleutherus (Plin. 'H. N.' v. 17). The exact position is uncertain. Tryphon, on making his escape from Dor, appears to have fled first to Ptolemaïs (Charax, Fr. 14), whence he proceeded to Orthosias, and thence to Apamea in the valley of the Orontes. At Apamea, he either committed suicide (Strab. xiv. 5, § 2), or was put to death (Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 7, § 2).

§ 5. WAR OF ANTIOCHUS SIDETES WITH SIMON—JUDÆA INVADED BY CENDEBÆUS.

38–41. On the escape of Tryphon, Antiochus resolved to divide his forces, and, while pursuing Tryphon with a portion, to send the remainder, under a general named Cendebæus, to invade Judæa. He was sagacious enough to perceive that Tryphon had ceased to be formidable, and must soon be taken or surrender himself, while Simon was far more to be dreaded. Cendebæus had orders to move southwards towards Judæa, and occupy a strong post, known as Cedron, in the vicinity of Jamnia, whence he would be able to make inroads into the Jewish territory. The present passage describes his execution of these orders, and establishment at Jamnia and Cedron, to the great detriment of Simon's subjects in that quarter.

38. captain of the sea coast.] The tract from Carmel to Gaza is probably intended. It was a long tract of lowland, known as Sharon in the more northern, and as Philistia in the more southern portion. The chief maritime towns, besides Dor and Gaza, were Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Ashdod, and Ascalon.

39. commanded him to remove his host toward Judea.] Literally, "to encamp over against Judæa," i.e. to take up a position outside the Jewish territory, but near it, and opposite to it, so to speak.

to build up Cedron.] Literally, "to build Cedron." Cedron has not been previously mentioned. It must have been within a short distance of Jamnia (Jabneh) and Azotus (Esdud), and must have had a watercourse eastward of it. These conditions are fulfilled by the modern Katra or Kutrah, which lies in the flat country a little below the river Rubin and three miles S.W. of Akir or Ekron, and which is therefore thought to be "Cedron."

40. Cendebeus came to Jamnia.] Jamnia, when last mentioned (ch. x. 69), was in the possession of Demetrius II. It now readily acknowledged the authority of Sidetes.

began to provoke the people.] I.e. the Jews.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 139. 41 And when he had built up Cedron, he set horsemen there, and an host of footmen, to the end that issuing out they might make outroads upon the ways of Judea, as the king had commanded him.

CHAPTER XVI.

3 Judas and John prevail against the forces sent by Antiochus. 11 The captain of Jericho inviteth Simon and two of his sons into his castle, and there treacherously murdereth them. 19 John is sought for, 22 and escapeth, and killeth those that sought for him.

[a] ch. 13. 53. THEN came up John [a]from Gazara, and told Simon his father what Cendebeus had done.

2 Wherefore Simon called his two eldest sons, Judas and John, and said unto them, [b]I, and my brethren, and my father's house, have ever from our youth unto this day fought against the enemies of Israel; and [c]things have prospered so well in our hands, that we have delivered Israel oftentimes.

B. C. cir. 138. [b] ch. 14. 26. [c] ch. 3. 6. & 14. 36.

3 But now I am old, and ye, by God's mercy, are of a sufficient age: be ye instead of me and my brother, and go and fight for our nation, and the help from heaven be with you.

41. they might make outroads upon the ways of Judea.] The word "outroad," which does not occur elsewhere in the A. V., is scarcely English. Translate—"they might make expeditions along the roads of Judæa." It is clear that the position of Cedron commanded several lines of route from the low country into Judæa, and thus afforded facilities for invasion.

CHAPTER XVI.

§ 1. SEQUEL OF THE WAR OF SIDETES AGAINST SIMON—CENDEBÆUS DEFEATED BY JOHN HYRCANUS.

1–10. The war of petty inroad, now on one line of route, now on another, which Cendebæus was carrying on by the directions of Sidetes (ch. xv. 41), was an annoyance rather than a danger, yet seemed to need to be met by prompt action. John, therefore, the son of Simon, who commanded in these parts, having his head-quarters at Gazara (ch. xiii. 54; xvi. 1), proceeded to Jerusalem to consult his father on the emergency. Hereupon Simon, who had already designated his son John for captain of the host (ch. xiii. 54), formally devolved the command on him and his brother Judas, whom he directed to march against Cendebæus at the head of an army of 20,000 men, composed both of horse and foot. His commands were executed, and in a pitched battle, fought with Cendebæus near Cedron, the two brothers gained a great victory, completely routing the Syrian host, which fled from the field to Cedron, and from Cedron to the watch-towers of Ashdod. Judas being wounded, John conducted the pursuit, and pressed it to Ashdod itself, which he took and burnt. He then returned to Judæa in peace.

1. Then came up John from Gazara.] Compare ch. xiii. 54, where we are told that John's residence was fixed at Gazara, which lay but a short distance from Cedron.

and told Simon . . . what Cendebeus had done.] Rather, what "Cendebeus was accomplishing." He was continually making inroads, ravaging the territory, killing such as resisted, and carrying off numerous prisoners (ch. xv. 40). These were no doubt sold to the slave-merchants. (Compare ch. iii. 41.)

2. his two eldest sons.] Literally, "his two elder sons." He seems to have had, in all, three sons: Judas, the eldest; Johanan or John, the second; and a third, whose name was Mattathias. The eldest and youngest sons were involved in the fate of their father, being murdered by Ptolemy the son of Abubus at a banquet (infra, v. 16). John alone escaped, and thus, though only the second son, succeeded his father (vv. 22, 23).

I, and my brethren, and my father's house.] See note on ch. xiii. 3.

have delivered Israel oftentimes.] I.e. "have repulsed and defeated an invader." Compare ch. iii. 11, 23; iv. 14, 34; vii. 43; ix. 66–68; x. 82.

3. now I am old.] On the probable age of Simon, see the comment on ch. xiii. 53.

by God's mercy.] Literally, "through mercy." With his usual extreme reverence and reticence, the author abstains from introducing the name of God. Compare ch. iii. 18, 22, 33; iv. 10, 55; vii. 37, 41, &c.

be ye instead of me and my brother.] Simon is thinking of the time, when, all the brothers being dead but himself and Jonathan, the cause of national independence and religious purity was upheld by the two conjointly, both being at the head of armies, and lending valuable aid the one to the other. (See ch. ix. 62–67; x. 74–84; xi. 60–74; xii. 24–38.) He intends Judas and John to act similarly, and anticipates a long and prosperous career for both.

the help from heaven.] I.e. God's help; but again the Holy Name is suppressed.

B. C. cir. 138.

4 So he chose out of the country twenty thousand men of war with horsemen, who went out against Cendebeus, and rested that night at Modin.

5 And when as they rose in the morning, and went into the plain, behold, a mighty great host both of footmen and horsemen came against them: howbeit there was a water brook betwixt them.

6 So he and his people pitched over against them: and when he saw that the people were afraid to go over the water brook, he went first over himself, and then the men seeing him passed through after him.

7 That done, he divided his men, B. C. cir. 138. and set the horsemen in the midst of the footmen: for the enemies' horsemen were very many.

8 Then sounded they with the holy trumpets: whereupon Cendebeus and his host were put to flight, so that many of them were slain, and the remnant gat them to the strong hold.

9 At that time was Judas John's brother wounded; but John still followed after them, until he came to Cedron, which Cendebeus had built.

10 ‖So they fled even unto the towers in the fields of Azotus; wherefore he burned it with fire: so

‖ Or, Which when he had set on fire, they fled unto the tower in the fields of Azotus; and there were slain, &c.

4. he chose out . . twenty thousand men.] He could now bring into the field 40,000 men, if necessary (ch. xii. 41); but the occasion did not seem to require so many. He preferred a smaller picked army.

with horsemen.] Cavalry are here for the first time mentioned as employed by the Maccabee princes. The force was probably a small one (see v. 7).

at Modin.] Modin, or Modeïn, was not very far from Cedron, and lay on the direct route between that place and Jerusalem. (See the comment on ch. ii. 1, and ch. xiii. 25–30.) It commanded the view over the maritime plain far and wide. Posted at Modeïn, Judas and John would be able to see the entire disposition of the enemy's forces.

5. there was a water brook betwixt them.] Rather, "a water-course"—i.e. the dry stream of a winter torrent. This is supposed to have been the modern Wady Rubin, which runs a little to the east of Kutrah, the supposed site of Cedron. (See the comment on ch. xv. 39.)

6. he and his people.] It is questioned, which of the brothers is intended, Judas or John. As Judas has certainly been assigned the most prominent place in v. 2, it might so far be supposed that the reference was to him. But on the other hand, we have to remember (1) That John was designated as "captain of all the hosts" in B.C. 141, without any mention of Judas (ch. xiii. 53); (2) That it was John who took the important step of consulting Simon on the emergency; and (3) That John is so much the foremost figure on the Jewish side in the eye of the writer, that, to identify Judas, he speaks of him as "John's brother" (v. 9). These facts give a prominence to John, which makes it almost certain that the actions recorded in vv. 6 and 7 are his.

the people were afraid to go over the water brook.] They would be at a disadvantage if attacked while they were crossing; and they would fight at a disadvantage with such an obstacle in their rear.

7. he divided his men, and set the horsemen in the midst of the footmen.] The meaning seems to be, that, instead of placing the cavalry on the wings, according to ordinary practice, or drawing them up in a body, to watch events and make a charge when necessary, John intermixed the two arms of the service, blending cavalry and infantry together into a mixed mass. The arrangement is not one likely to commend itself to modern tacticians. It was, however, adopted upon occasions by the Romans (Val. Max. i. 3, § 3; Denison's 'History of Cavalry,' p. 73). John had recourse to it, because his cavalry was scanty, and, if it had acted alone, might easily have been annihilated by the numerous cavalry of the enemy.

8. Then sounded they with the holy trumpets.] Compare ch. iv. 13; v. 33; ix. 12, &c. The epithet "holy" is omitted in several MSS.

many of them were slain.] Literally, "many of them fell wounded." (Compare ch. iii. 11.)

the remnant gat them to the strong hold.] I.e. to Cedron (ch. xv. 39, 41).

10. the towers in the fields of Azotus.] Watch-towers were common, both in Palestine, and in the adjacent countries, which were liable to sudden incursions of the wandering tribes, Arabs, Edomites, Amalekites, &c. Hence the expression "from the tower of the watchman unto the fenced city" (2 Kings xvii. 9, xviii. 8).

he burned it with fire.] The Vulgate has

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 138. that there were slain of them about two thousand men. Afterward he returned into the land of Judea in peace.

cir. 135. 11 Moreover in the plain of Jericho was Ptolemeus the son of Abubus made captain, and he had abundance of silver and gold:

12 For he was the high priest's son in law.

13 Wherefore his heart being lifted up, he thought to get the country to himself, and thereupon consulted deceitfully against Simon and his sons to destroy them. B. C. cir. 135.

14 Now Simon was visiting the cities that were in the country, and taking care for the good ordering of them; at which time he came down himself to Jericho with his sons, Mattathias and Judas, in the hun-

"them" for "it," as though there had been a reading of αὐτοὺς for αὐτήν, but this reading is not found in the MSS. If αὐτήν be preferred, we must regard the antecedent as Azotus, which was probably at this time not a place of much strength. (Compare ch. x. 84; xi. 4.)

two thousand men.] The MSS. vary between 1000, 2000, and 3000. The Syrian Version has 3000. We should have expected a greater destruction from the terms in which the host of Cendebæus is described in v. 5.

§ 2. MURDER OF SIMON, AND TWO OF HIS SONS, BY PTOLEMY THE SON OF ABUBUS.

11–17. If the war with Cendebæus was in B.C. 138, as seems probable, there must have been an interval of about three years between its termination and the death of Simon. It was probably now that Simon found time for the accomplishment of his works of peace (ch. xiii. 27–30; xiv. 5–15). After the failure of the expedition of Cendebæus, Sidetes left Simon to himself, waiting for a favourable opportunity to renew his attack. Simon's administration of the government continued to be active and energetic, the old man personally visiting the various cities of his kingdom, and inquiring into their condition. It was while he was engaged in one of these tours of inspection that he laid himself open to a treacherous onslaught. He had married a daughter to a certain "Ptolemy, son of Abubus," and had intrusted to his government the rich district about Jericho. Ptolemy had grown wealthy in this office, and aspired to the supreme power. If he could remove Simon and his sons, he thought Sidetes might be prevailed on to accept him as vassal monarch. Accordingly he arranged matters so that when it was his turn to be visited, Simon should fall into a trap and lose his life. Had all Simon's sons accompanied him, the plot might have had a complete success. As it was, Mattathias and Judas shared the fate of their father; but John, who was at Gazara, escaped.

11. in the plain of Jericho.] The "Arboth-Jericho," or "plain of Jericho," was the rich tract towards the mouth of the Jordan described by Josephus ('B. J.' iv. 8, § 3) as seventy stades (eight miles) long by twenty stades (2¼ miles) broad. It was well watered by a "most exuberant fountain." The "fertility of the soil was unexampled. Palms of various names and properties—some that produced honey scarcely inferior to that of the neighbourhood; opobalsamum, the choicest of indigenous fruits; cyprus and myrobalsamum, throve there beautifully, and were thickly dotted about in pleasure grounds" ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. i. p. 769).

was Ptolemeus . . . made captain.] The office assigned him was, probably, at once civil and military. Jericho had to be held as an outpost against the Trans-Jordanic nomades. At the same time its governor was expected to remit to the treasury a considerable revenue.

he had abundance of silver and gold.] His wealth, as Grimm thinks, may have been derived, in part at least, from the dowry which he had received with his wife, Simon's daughter (see the next verse); but it is likely to have resulted as much from the opulence and fertility of the province which he administered. (Compare Joseph. l. s. c.)

13. he thought to get the country to himself.] The success of such upstarts as Balas and Tryphon, who, born in a private station, nevertheless placed the Syrian crown on their heads, must have been exceedingly demoralising at this period, and have lit up the flame of ambition in many a heart. The relation of Judæa to Syria still further favoured illegitimate attempts, since the Syrian monarchs were at once open to bribes and to cajolery.

against Simon and his sons.] Ptolemy seems to have been quite aware that his work would be but half done, if he allowed any son of Simon to escape. It was a part of his scheme to remove John (v. 19) no less than Judas and Mattathias.

14. Mattathias and Judas.] The order of the names is curious, since Judas was certainly the elder brother (see v. 2). We cannot conclude from it, however, that the

B. C. cir. 135. dred threescore and seventeenth year, in the eleventh month, called Sabat:

15 Where the son of Abubus receiving them deceitfully into a little hold, called Docus, which he had built, made them a great banquet: howbeit he had hid men there.

16 So when Simon and his sons had drunk largely, Ptolemee and his men rose up, and took their weapons, and came upon Simon into the banqueting place, and slew him, and his two sons, and certain of his servants. B. C. cir. 135.

17 In which doing he committed a great treachery, and recompensed evil for good.

author does not, as a general rule, mention brothers in the order of their seniority.

in the hundred threescore and seventeenth year.] The 177th Seleucid year began in Oct. B.C. 136 and ended in Oct. B.C. 135. As the month Sabat corresponded nearly to February, we may place the death of Simon in Feb. B.C. 135.

the eleventh month, called Sabat.] Compare Zech. i. 7.

15. a little hold, called Docus.] Rather, "called Dok." The Syriac version has "Doak," the Greek Δώκ. Josephus gives the name as "Dagon," which is not likely to have been the name of a place. The word Dôk seems to remain in the modern Ain-Duk, a set of "copious and excellent springs which burst forth in the Wady Nawâ'imeh at the foot of the mountain of Quarantania, about four miles north-west of Jericho" ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. i. p. 446). Above the springs are traces of ancient foundations, which may be the remains of Ptolemy's "little hold."

16. had drunk largely.] The original goes further than this. It says that they "were drunken." Intemperance, though not a characteristic national vice, was far from being unknown among the Jews. (See Deut. xxi. 20; 1 Sam. xxv. 36; 2 Sam. xi. 13; 1 Kings xvi. 9, &c.) It may lower our estimate of this Maccabean hero, to find that, when tempted, he gave way to this vice; but there is really no ground for surprise, that, in a rough age, even Jewish princes indulged in the habits common to royal personages of the period. The Maccabee princes were not saints.

Ptolemee and his men rose up.] The expression used seems to imply that Ptolemy took an active part in the murders. Royal murderers usually depute the actual execution of their schemes to others; but Ptolemy was not averse from sharing in the scene of blood himself.

his two sons.] I.e. the two who had accompanied him to Jericho, Judas and Mattathias. (See v. 14.) The account in Josephus ('A. J.' xiii. 8, § 1), that these princes were made prisoners, and only put to death after a long delay, is contradictory to the narrative of our author, and deserves no credit. The pathetic history of their mother is, to some extent, discredited by its connection with false statements; but it may nevertheless be true, since it is compatible with all that related by our author. (Cf. Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 365.)

17. he committed a great treachery.] Ἀθεσία is from ἀθετεῖν, and properly means a rightful or wrongful repudiation of engagements. But in the later Greek, it is always employed in a bad sense, of engagements that have been perfidiously broken. (Polyb. ii. 32, § 8; iii. 49, § 2; 70, § 4; 78, § 2, &c.)

§ 3. SEQUEL TO THE BOLD ATTEMPT OF PTOLEMY. HE DESIGNS TO KILL JOHN HYRCANUS, BUT FAILS.

18–22. It must be supposed that Ptolemy had belonged to the patriotic party; otherwise he would certainly not have been accepted as a son-in-law by the High Priest (v. 12). Still, under the existing circumstances, he had to throw himself on the support of the opposite side. Accordingly, he at once sent off envoys to Sidetes, offering to restore the whole country to its former condition of subjection to Syria, on condition of receiving the support of a Syrian army. At the same time he dispatched emissaries to Gazara, with orders to kill John (v. 19). Nor did he neglect the capital, but sent such a force as he could spare, to seize both the city of Jerusalem and the Temple hill (v. 20). His plans were exceedingly well laid, if only he had had sufficient force to carry them out. But John received timely warning of what was intended, and frustrated all Ptolemy's projects. He seized and executed the emissaries who had accepted the mission to put him to death (v. 22), and, as we learn from Josephus ('A.J.' xiii. 8, § 1), at once took the offensive against his adversary, shut him up in Dôk, and after a little time drove him to seek a refuge in the Trans-Jordanic territory, after which nothing more is heard of him. John succeeded to his father's double office of civil governor and High Priest of the nation.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 135.

18 Then Ptolemee wrote these things, and sent to the king, that he should send him an host to aid him, and he would deliver him the country and cities.

19 He sent others also to Gazara to kill John: and unto the ‖tribunes he sent letters to come unto him, that he might give them silver, and gold, and rewards.

‖ Gr. captains of thousands.

20 And others he sent to take Jerusalem, and the mountain of the temple.

21 Now one had run afore to Gazara, and told John that his father and brethren were slain, and, quoth he, Ptolemee hath sent to slay thee also.

B. C. cir. 135

22 Hereof when he heard, he was sore astonished: so he laid hands on them that were come to destroy him, and slew them; for he knew that they sought to make him away.

23 As concerning the rest of the acts of John, and his wars, and worthy deeds which he did, and the building of the walls which he made, and his doings, 24 Behold, these are written in the chronicles of his priesthood, from the time he was made high priest after his father.

18. Ptolemee wrote these things.] Ptolemy made a merit of his atrocious action in his application to the Syrian king, and attempted no concealment of it. He had removed one of Antiochus's most dangerous enemies, thereby entitling himself to that monarch's gratitude. He asked for aid in return. Aware, however, that gratitude does not always determine the policy of kings, he sought to enlist the king's self-interest on his side.

he would deliver him the country and cities.] Antiochus had offered to remain at peace with Simon on the restoration of Joppa, Gazara, and the Acra. Ptolemy is willing to concede not only these, but the entire "country."

19. He sent others also to Gazara.] Where John resided (ch. xiii. 53; xvi. 1).

unto the tribunes he sent letters.] Literally, to the "chiliarchs" or "captains of thousands." The appointment of such officers by Judas Maccabeus had been previously mentioned (ch. iii. 55).

21. his father and brethren were slain.] Compare v. 16, and comment ad loc.

22. he laid hands on them that were come to destroy him, and slew them.] Self-defence would have justified the act, had he been a mere private person. But the terms of the decree recorded in ch. xiv. 27–45 had invested him with the office of hereditary ruler, and from the moment of his father's death he was chief of the state, and bound to crush an attempt at revolution.

§ 4. The Reader referred to the Chronicles of John's High-Priesthood for the rest of his Actions.

23–24. The writer—for what reason is uncertain—does not design to carry on his history beyond the death of Simon. Though acquainted with the "wars" of John, and his "worthy deeds," he abstains from recording them. He tells us they are to be found in the "Chronicles of his Priesthood." And with these words he terminates his history. The "Chronicles of the High Priests" have perished; and for a knowledge of the actions of John historians have to depend wholly and solely upon Josephus. Josephus is far from deserving of implicit credence; but his history of John, running counter, as much of it does, to his national vanity, seems to be, in its general outline, trustworthy. The reader desirous of pursuing the subject may be referred to Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 8–10; to Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. pp. 342–384; and to Dean Stanley's 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 366–368.

23. the rest of the acts.] The Greek has "of the words;" but the Hebrew dibrey, which has both meanings, here, no doubt, signified "acts."

his wars.] See Josephus, 'A. J.' l. s. c.

the building of the walls which he made.] Antiochus Sidetes, after his successful siege of Jerusalem, in B.C. 133, required the destruction of the walls of Jerusalem (Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 8, § 3; Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' i. 40, § 18). It cannot be doubted, that when, about B.C. 125, the civil war in Syria enabled John to resume a position of independence, one of his first acts would have been the restoration of the defences of the capital. This is probably the "building of the walls" of the present passage.

24. Behold, these are written in the Chronicles of his Priesthood.] Literally, "in the book of the days of his priesthood." It may perhaps account for the author concluding his history at this point, that, from the time of John Hyrcanus, a public record of all important facts, intermitted for so many years, began once more to be kept, so that the labours of a mere private writer ceased to be necessary.

THE SECOND BOOK

OF THE

MACCABEES.

INTRODUCTION.

	PAGE
§ I. Plan of the Work, and its Divisions	539
§ II. Style and Diction	540
§ III. Historical Value of the Book	540
§ IV. Sources of the Book	542
§ V. Treatment of his main Source by the Writer	543
§ VI. Date of Composition, and Author	544
§ VII. Religious Tone of the Book	544

§ I. Plan of the Work, and its Divisions.

THE object of the writer was to give an account of the circumstances under which Judas Maccabeus raised the standard of revolt against the Syrian power, and succeeded after many desperate battles in establishing Jewish independence. His main narrative commences in chap. iii., and is divided into five portions: 1. An account of the troubles in Judæa from the coming of Heliodorus to Jerusalem until the pollution of the Temple and suspension of the Jewish worship (chaps. iii.–v.); 2. An account of the profanation of the Temple, the suspension of the Jewish worship, and the cruel persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes (chaps. vi., vii.); 3. A history of the insurrection under Judas, and his struggles to establish Jewish freedom up to the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (chaps. viii.–x. 9); 4. An account of the continuation of the struggle up to the death of Antiochus Eupator (chaps. x. 10–xiii.); and 5. An account of the war with Demetrius I. up to the defeat and death of Nicanor (chaps. xiv., xv.). The history covers a space of about twenty years, commencing about B.C. 180, in the reign of Seleucus Philopator over Syria and the high priesthood of Onias III., and terminating in the second year of Demetrius Soter, B.C. 161. It is the writer's special desire to glorify Judas Maccabeus, whom he views as the founder of the independence of Judæa, and he therefore abruptly terminates his history with the defeat of Nicanor at Adasa, choosing to consider that by that defeat the independence was won.

To his main narrative the writer prefixes an introduction, which divides itself into two parts. The former part consists of two detached documents, purporting to be letters that had been addressed by the Jews of Jerusalem to their brethren in Egypt, on the subject of keeping the Dedication festival instituted by Judas Maccabeus on his recovery of the Temple. The first of these letters occupies nine verses at the beginning of the first chapter of the work; the second extends from chap. i. 10 to chap. ii. 18. The letters are curious, but of scarcely any historical value, being the production of some forger or forgers, who imposed upon the simplicity of our author. They have scarcely any connection with the historical narrative to which they are prefixed; and the supposed facts related in the second are wholly unworthy of credit. The second portion of the introduction extends from chap. ii. 19 to 32, and is of the nature of a modern "preface," containing a brief summary of contents, a statement of the source from which the writer derived his materials, and an explanation of the mode in which he proposed to deal with them. Thus the scheme of the work may be exhibited as follows:—

Introduction (chaps. i., ii.).
- Detached documents (chaps. i.–ii. 18).
 - First Letter (chap. i. 1–9).
 - Second Letter (chap. i. 10 to chap. ii. 18).
- Preface (chap. ii. 19–32).

Main narrative (ch. iii.–xv.).
- The troubles anterior to the pollution of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes (chaps. iii.–v.).
- The pollution and the persecution which followed it (chaps. vi., vii.).
- The insurrection of the Jews and the war of Judas with Epiphanes (chaps. viii.–x. 9).
- The war of Judas with Antiochus Eupator (chap. x. 10 to chap. xiii. 26).
- The war of Judas with Demetrius I. up to the death of Nicanor (chaps. xiv., xv.).

§ II. Style and Diction.

The diction of the Second Book of Maccabees offers a remarkable contrast to that of the First Book. Whereas in the First Book Hebraisms are almost continual, in the Second they are of exceedingly rare occurrence. Only two or three have been pointed out;[1] and they are not of a very marked character. On the other hand, the use of idiomatic Greek phrases is constant; and the Greek generally is almost as good as that of Polybius or Appian. Novel words are, however, frequent,[2] and many words are used in strange and unusual senses.[3] Still, the meaning is, for the most part, sufficiently clear, the novel words being mostly derivatives from well-known roots.

There is a great variety in the style of writing. Sometimes, though not often, it is simple and natural; but more commonly it is stilted and artificial, deformed by a straining after rhetorical effect, by the affectation of unnecessarily long words and ponderous sentences, by an excessive use of ornament, and the employment of far-fetched images and false antithesis. Occasionally it falls into the very opposite faults, is rude and broken, awkward from its brevity, more resembling the first rough notes of a tyro from which he intends to work out his narrative, than the completed composition of a literary adept. Altogether the style is unpleasant and unsatisfactory, giving the idea of effort and display, of affectation and bad taste, of over-elaboration and over-colouring, and producing a certain distrust of the writer's strict adherence to truth.

§ III. Historical Value of the Book.

In estimating the value of the Second Book of Maccabees as an historical authority, we must begin with drawing a [1] See chap. viii. 15; ix. 5; xiv. 24.

[2] The following have been noticed by Prof. Westcott:—ἐμφανισμός (chap. iii. 9); ἀλλοφυλισμός (iv. 13; vi. 24); διεμπίμπλημι (iv. 20); θωρακισμός (v. 3); δυσπέτημα (v. 20); συνεκκεντεῖν (v. 26); ἑλληνισμός (vi. 13); σπλαγχνισμός (vi. 7, 21; vii. 42); ἀπευθανατίζειν (vi. 28); ἐτασμός (vii. 37); προσαναλέγεσθαι (viii. 19); ὁπλολογεῖν (viii. 27, 31); δοξικός, viii. 35); πολεμοτροφεῖν (x. 14, 15); ἀνδρολογία (xii. 43); διάσταλσις (xiii. 25); προσπυροῦν (xiv. 11); ἐπευλαβεῖσθαι (xiv. 18); κατευθικτεῖν (xiv. 43); and προσυπομιμνήσκειν (xv. 9). To these may be added θαυμασμός (chap. vii. 18); πρωτοκλισία (iv. 21); δεξιάζεσθαι (iv. 34); προπτύειν (vi. 20); ἀποδιαστέλλεσθαι (vi. 5); ὑπεραγόντως (vii. 20); εὐγενίζειν (x. 13); λεοντηδόν (xi. 11); εὐαπάντητος (xiv. 9); ἀποῤῥωγάς (xiv. 46); and αὐλαῖος (xiv. 41).

[3] As the following:—εἰσκυκλεῖσθαι (chap. ii. 24), "to engage oneself in a subject," usually "to be rolled in" or "brought in;" διάληψιν ἔχειν (iii. 32); "to conceive"—generally "to have a discussion" or "to be reputed;" ψυχικῶς (iv. 37; xiv. 24); "heartily, ex animo"—in ordinary Greek, "spiritually;" φρυάσσομαι (vii. 34), "to be elated," commonly "to fret, rage, be insolent;" ἀναζυγή (ix. 2), "return, retreat," ordinarily "journey, moving of a camp;" ἐναπερείδομαι (ix. 4), "to avenge, retaliate," properly "to strike a blow on," or "to drive a sting in;" πεφρενωμένος (xi. 4), "puffed up," properly "gifted with intellect;" ἐκλύειν (xii. 18), "to depart" instead of "to faint;" δευτερολογεῖν (xiii. 22), "to address a second time," generally "to make the second speech, some one else having made the first;" ἀκληρεῖν (xiv. 8), "to be wretched," properly "to be without a share;" φυγαδεύειν (xiv. 14), "to fly from," properly "to put to flight;" διεξάγειν (xiv. 30), "to behave," commonly "to pass (one's life)," or "to take care of," and ἀποκαθιστάναι (xv. 20), "to arrange, station," commonly "to restore."

Digitized by Microsoft®

marked line between the "Introductory Documents" and the "Main Narrative." The introductory documents are almost certainly forgeries. It is highly improbable that the Jews of Jerusalem should, amid the troubles of the year B.C. 144–3, have addressed a letter to their brethren at Alexandria desiring them to keep the festival of the Dedication. It is quite impossible that, either in B.C. 165 or B.C. 125,[1] they should have written the farrago of false history and trashy legend which constitutes the second letter, and is said to have been sent by Judas Maccabeus to Aristobulus, Ptolemy Philometor's teacher (chap. i. 10). The author of the Book is, however, not necessarily to be charged with the fabrication of the two documents which he prefixes to his narrative, and with one of which his narrative is in direct contradiction.[2] It is far more probable that he found the documents already in existence at the time when he wrote, but had not the critical acumen to discover their worthlessness. Alexandria was, in the second century B.C., a workshop where letters, decrees, and public communications of all kinds from one government to another were freely produced by the facile pens of literary adventurers.[3] Historical criticism was ill developed at the time when our author wrote, and he was certainly not a person of sound judgment. It is easy to understand his being imposed upon by works the tone of which was agreeable to him, though no great ingenuity had been shewn in their concoction.

The main narrative is not to be condemned unheard on account of its poor and somewhat tawdry frontispiece. It proceeds, as will appear hereafter,[4] from an entirely different source. It breathes a tone that is, on the whole, not untruthful or extravagant. It admits faults and sins on the part of the writer's countrymen,[5] which a dishonest man would have concealed. Though in general excessive in its numerical statements, it is occasionally more moderate than even the First Book,[1] and it is confirmed in some important particulars by classical writers and classical remains.[2]

On the other hand, it must be admitted, first, that the work contains numerous historical mistakes; and, secondly, that the writer has certain prejudices and prepossessions which render him in some matters untrustworthy as an historian. Among historical errors of an obvious character may be mentioned the following:—1. The presence of Antiochus Epiphanes in Jerusalem at the time of the great persecution, and his actual superintendence of the tortures inflicted on the martyrs (chap. vii. 3–39); 2. The circumstances of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (chap. ix. 4–28); 3. The time of the first expedition of Lysias into Judæa (chap. xi. 1–15); 4. The relations between Lysias and Antiochus Eupator (chap. x. 11); 5. The period of time during which the Temple lay waste before its purification and re-dedication by Judas (chap. x. 3); 6. The date of the recovery of the Acra (chap. xv. 31, 35); 7. The landing of Demetrius I. on the coast of Syria "with a great power and navy" (chap. xiv. 1). Among the writer's prejudices and prepossessions two are especially noticeable:—1. His bitter hatred of the Syrians, which is manifested at every turn (chap. v. 11–24; vii. 3, 4, 9, 27, 34; viii. 32, 34; ix. 7, 13, 28; xii. 23; xiii. 9; xiv. 27, 39; xv. 3, 6, 32, 33), and which cannot but make him an unfair judge of their conduct and intentions; and 2. His predilection for the marvellous, which causes him to accept as true, and put forward with the

[1] The MSS. vary between these two dates in chap. i. 10.

[2] Compare chap. i. 13–16 with chap. ix. 1–4.

[3] See Ewald, 'History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 467, E. T.

[4] See § 4, on the Sources of the Book.

[5] See chap. iv. 3, 7–17, 32; v. 15, 23; vi. 12–17; viii. 13; x. 20; xii. 40; xiii. 21; xiv. 3.

[1] The highest estimate of the Syrian forces made by the author of the Second Book is 115,300 (chap. xiii. 2), whereas the author of the First Book gives the number on one occasion as 128,000 (chap. xv. 13), and on another (chap. vi. 30) as 120,000. Nicanor's force in B.C. 166–5 is reckoned at 54,000 men in 1 Macc. iii. 39, at no more than 20,000 in 2 Macc. viii. 9.

[2] The position of Heliodorus in the court of Seleucus (chap. iii. 7, 37, is confirmed by Appian, ('Syriaca,' § 45); the conferring of an Antiochian citizenship on inhabitants of other towns (chap. iv. 9, 19) by coins of Ptolemaïs (Mionnet, 'Description de Médailles,' vol. v. Nos. 333, 472, 522–534; vol. viii. No. 159).

utmost force of which he is capable,[1] the "manifestations" of Divine Power (ἐπιφανείας) which were said to have occurred in the course of the struggle between the Jews and their oppressors, and by means of which, principally, the Jews achieved their independence. Considering the fact that the author of the First Book, certainly a writer nearer to the events, knows of no such "manifestations," we may assume that the period was not one in which miracles were really wrought. The ἐπιφάνειαι of 2 Maccabees are thus later additions to the real history, either invented by literary men as embellishments, or beliefs that gradually grew up among a credulous and marvel-loving people. Our present author may not have been the first to introduce them into a written history, but his full acceptance of them cannot but detract from our estimate of his critical judgment.

Yet the value of the Book is considerable. For a certain period of Jewish history—the four or five years preceding the accession of Epiphanes (chap. iii.–iv. 6)—it is our sole authority. For the succeeding period—from B.C. 176 to B.C. 166—it runs parallel with 1 Macc. i. 10–64, but is much more full and exact in details (chap. iv. 7 to end of chap. vii.), and therefore very serviceable. For the closing period of which it treats—from B.C. 166 to B.C. 161—it is of greatly inferior value, being on about the same scale as the First Book, and of much weaker authority. Still, even in this last portion (chaps. viii.–xv.), its historical value is not absolutely nil, since it occasionally furnishes trustworthy details on points on which the writer of the First Book has omitted to touch. Instances of this are the account of Ptolemy Macron in chap. x. 12, 13; the story of the covetousness of Simon (chap. x. 19–22); the wicked deed of the men of Joppa (chap. xii. 3–5); Judas's victory over a body of Arabs (chap. xii. 10–12); the fate of Menelaus (chap. xiii. 3–8); the treachery of Rhodocus (chap. xiii. 21); the landing of Demetrius I. at Tripolis (chap. xiv. 1); the negotiations between Judas and Nicanor (chap. xiv. 19–26); and the suicide of Razis (chap. xiv. 37–46). Where the writer of the Second Book is at variance with the author of the First, his authority must be set aside as worthless; but where his narrative is additional, compatible, and not in itself improbable, it may be fairly used to eke out the somewhat meagre sketch which the writer of the First Book has thought sufficient for his purposes. A delicate discrimination is no doubt needed for the separation of the false from the true in the writer's statements, the genuine from the fabricated; but the truly critical historian will, we believe, find it feasible to obtain from the Second Book of the Maccabees a not inconsiderable amount of valuable historical material.[1] [1] See chap. iii. 25, 26, 33, 34; x. 29, 30; xi. 8; xii. 22; xv. 23–27.

§ IV. Sources of the Book.

According to the express statement of the writer (chap. ii. 19–23), his main narrative is drawn entirely from a single source, being simply an epitome of a work written by a certain "Jason of Cyrene," of whom we have no other notice. Jason's work, he says, was one in five "Books," which he proposed to concentrate into a single treatise. It comprised an account of the deeds of Judas Maccabeus and his brothers, of the purification of the Temple, the dedication of the altar, the wars of the Jews with Antiochus Epiphanes and his son Eupator, and the manifestations of Divine power (ἐπιφανείας) which had enabled the Jews to overcome their enemies, and bring the struggle to a successful issue. It was a laborious history, teeming with facts, and bristling with numerical statements (chap. ii. 24), afford-

[1] Ewald says: "A closer acquaintance with the style and method of the Book, and the discernment of those portions in which the mere form of the historical elements predominates, enable us, in the deficiency of other and older sources, to derive from it much genuine historical material, especially for the earlier part of the history" ('History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 467, E. T.). Professor Westcott considers the work "not a connected and complete history, but a series of special incidents from the life of Judas, illustrating the providential interference of God in behalf of His people, true in substance, but embellished in form" ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 177).

Digitized by Microsoft®

ing interesting but somewhat dry reading to students, but not calculated to attract the regard or attention of those who read books, not to increase their stock of knowledge, but as an agreeable occupation. The object of our author was to popularise this work, which he proposed to do by condensing its facts and abridging its narratives, at the same time adorning them with elegant phrases and other graces of composition (chap. ii. 26–31).

Nothing is known of "Jason of Cyrene," or his work, beyond what may be gathered from these statements of our author. A native of Cyrene, though a Jew, would almost certainly write in Greek; and it may perhaps be assumed from the general character of the style and diction of the work, as we have it, that he wrote in good Greek. How he obtained his knowledge of the Maccabean struggle we have no means of determining, nor is it altogether clear to what public he addressed himself. Perhaps the most probable conjecture is, that, though born at Cyrene, he yet, like Callimachus, and other Cyrenæans, resided at Alexandria, and composed his treatise for the benefit of the Jewish community in that city. It is plain from chap. ii. 22, that the marvellous portions of the history, as we have it, are due to him, and not to the Epitomator, and we may therefore presume that to him too is owing the didactic and admonitory character of the entire treatise (chaps. iii. 28, 29; iv. 16, 17, 38; v. 9, 10, 19, 20; vi. 12–17, 31; viii. 35, 36; ix. 5–10, 28; xii. 41–45; xiii. 7, 8, &c.). The date at which Jason lived and wrote is even more uncertain than most other points respecting him. It is conceivable that his book may have been composed within a few years of the latest event that he notices, which is the embassy of Eupolemus to Rome (ch. iv. 11) in B.C. 161; it is, on the other hand, possible that he may not have written till shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem. Conjecture has placed the composition about the year B.C. 100.[1]

The work of Jason is to be viewed as the sole historical source of the Book from chap. iii. 1 to chap. xv. 37. Two short passages—chap. ii. 19–32 and chap. xv. 38, 39—are the mere expression of the thoughts of the writer. The remaining passage (chap. i. together with chap. ii. 1–18) is a transcript of documents which had fallen into the writer's hands, and which he appears to have set forth verbatim. The source of these documents would seem to have been the prolific imagination of certain Alexandrian littérateurs of little ability and less judgment.

[1] Westcott, l. s. c.; Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 370.

§ V. Treatment of his main Source by the Writer.

It has been observed in the preceding section, that the object of the author of the present work was to popularise the History of Jason of Cyrene, partly by abridging it, and partly by decking it out with supposed graces of composition. To what extent the abridgment proceeded, not having Jason's work, we cannot tell. Jason's work was "in five books" (chap. ii. 23), our author's is in one; but this does not prove that he has compressed Jason's narrative into one-fifth of the original space. There is only one place in the entire treatise (chap. xiii. 22–26) where the style of an abbreviator is very evident. There a narrative which may have occupied several pages is compressed into a dozen lines; but elsewhere there is no appearance of brevity having been especially studied. If it be allowable to make a conjecture, we should say that the "abridgment" (chap. ii. 26–31) was probably effected, rather by omission of considerable portions of the narrative, than by condensation of the parts selected for republication.

Less obscurity rests upon the Epitomator's method of adorning the work of his predecessor. His own proper style is sufficiently revealed by the two passages which are wholly from his pen—the "prologue" (as he calls it) in chap. ii. (verses 19–32), and the epilogue in chap. xv. (verses 38, 39). The style of these passages is of a very marked character. It is involved, highly rhetorical, full of long grand-sounding compound words, with an affected balance in the clauses, a labouring after antithesis, and an unnecessary introduction of similes. It would seem to be almost certain that where these characteristics, or a considerable number of them, are found in the main narrative, there the Epitomator has re-written, instead of merely abbreviating, the history as given by Jason. Such passages as chap. iii. 14–30; iv. 13–17; v. 13–21; vi. 18–31; vii. 1–41; ix. 4–17; xiv. 41–46; xv. 7–16 betray the hand of the rhetorician, and are dressed out in a garb which only an accomplished littérateur could have furnished. The letters also which are assigned to Epiphanes, Lysias, and Eupator (chap. ix. 19–27; xi. 16–33) bear traces of having been worked up, and have probably received their present shape rather from the Epitomator than from Jason. On the other hand, we may conclude that we have Jason's writing nearly untouched in the places from which the Epitomator's peculiarities are absent, as is the case in ch. iii. 4, 5, 7–11, 35–40; ch. iv. 3–10, 18, 19, 21–24, 27–36, &c.

§ VI. Date of Composition, and Author.

It would follow from the dates contained in the first chapter (verses 7 and 10), if they have not suffered corruption, that the author composed his work subsequently to the accession of Demetrius II. (Nicator), and even (if the second date be allowed) subsequently to that of Alexander II. (Zabinas), who succeeded Demetrius in B.C. 126. If, however, with Ewald[1] and two MSS., we substitute τεσσαρακοστοῦ for ὀγδοηκοστοῦ in chap. i. 10, then the latest date mentioned by the author will be B.C. 144–3, or the third year of Nicator in Syria, and the first of Simon in Judæa; and his work, so far, may have been composed as early as B.C. 142–140. Supposing Jason of Cyrene to have written his history about B.C. 160, which we have shewn to be possible,[2] the Epitomator may well have thought that the time was come for an adaptation of Jason's work to the taste of the general reader about twenty years later. If, however, for any reason, we lower the date of Jason, we must correspondingly lower that of the epitome. Those who assign the composition of Jason's history to about B.C. 100 suggest B.C. 50 for the present work;[1] but this is to allow an unnecessarily long interval between the two writers. B.C. 80 is quite as late a date as it is at all reasonable to assign to the Book, as we have it, even if Jason wrote about B.C. 100.

The author is probably an Alexandrian Jew. His Greek is too good for a native of Palestine at the period (B.C. 140–80). And his rhetoric is exactly what was in vogue at Alexandria under the later Ptolemies. He belongs to the most orthodox school of religious thought among the Jews; and though there is no reason for supposing that he was an actual Pharisee,[2] yet he would doubtless have sympathised with the Pharisees in their contentions with the Sadducean faction. He desires a more strict observance of the Palestinian festivals by his countrymen in Egypt (chap. i. 9, 18) than they were inclined to render; and perhaps designs to lessen their reverence for the Temple at Leontopolis, and induce them to carry their offerings to Jerusalem instead, and to deposit them in that most holy sanctuary "renowned all the world over" (chaps. ii. 22; iii. 12), which even kings themselves had delighted to "honour and magnify with their best gifts" (chap. iii. 2).

§ VII. Religious Tone of the Book.

In respect of its religious tone the Book stands in a most remarkable contrast with the First Book of Maccabees. Both writers are indeed pious and God-fearing men; both belong to the strictly orthodox party among their countrymen; both desire to keep to the old ways and avoid all Hellenistic innovations; and both, moreover, have the strongest pos-

[1] 'History of Israel,' vol. v. p. 259, note [1]. The date ΡΜΗ would readily pass into ΡΠΗ.

[2] See § IV. p. 171.

[1] Westcott, 'Dictionary of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 175; Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 370.

[2] Pharisaic teaching has been discovered in the entire concluding section of the work (chaps. xii.–xv.), and especially in chap. xii. 43–45, which is said to have been "plainly levelled against the Sadducees" (Bertholdt, quoted in Grimm's 'Introduction,' p. xv.).

Digitized by Microsoft®

sible conviction that God governs the world, and directs the course of mundane affairs by His over-ruling providence. But, in all other respects, their ideas and habits of thought on religious subjects are diametrically opposite. The writer of the First Book is reticent to excess on matters of religion, and especially chary of mentioning the Divine Name, if he can anyhow avoid it. The writer of the Second Book is wholly devoid of any such scruple; he openly declares his religious views and feelings on all suitable occasions, and freely uses the words "God" and "Lord" whenever his subject-matter leads him to refer to the Supreme Being. Again, the writer of the First Book abstains from introducing into his narrative any account of recent miraculous occurrences—he is either not aware that miracles were believed to have been wrought during the course of the Syro-Macedonian struggle, or, if he knows the stories, he disbelieves them. In the Second Book, on the contrary, the miraculous element is a main feature; and though no doubt the writer was following his authority, Jason, when he gave it a place in his narrative (chap. ii. 21), yet his elaboration of the stories, and the length at which he dwells on them, are a sufficient indication that he accepted their truth, and regarded them as among the most important events of his history. Further, the writer of the First Book is careful not to assume the rôle of a religious teacher; he withholds all observations on the history which he relates, and leaves the events themselves to make their own impression. The writer of the Second Book acts in an exactly opposite manner. He is pointedly didactic and admonitory. Sometimes he formally addresses religious exhortations to his readers (e.g. vi. 12–17; xii. 43–45); more usually, he appends his observations on the events as if they were forced from him by the strength of his own feelings and were not intended as admonitions (chap. iv. 16, 17, 38 ad fin.; v. 9, 10, 17–20; vi. 31; ix. 8–10, 28; xi. 10; xiii. 7, 8, 17; xv. 27, 35). The result is that the religious aspect of the history is kept continually before the reader's mind, who is taught on every page that impiety and blasphemy receive signal punishment at God's hands; that prayer is heard; that God fights openly on the side of His saints and delivers them; that, if He suffers them to be afflicted, it is for the purpose of chastening and purifying them; and that, even if they suffer the worst that can happen to man in this life, they will be rewarded in the Resurrection.

There is a certain amount of difference also between the tone of the two Books in respect of the stress laid on what is external in religion. The writer of the First Book has the Temple in high regard, but the writer of the Second is never wearied of extolling it. He calls it "the great temple" (chap. ii. 19), "the holy temple" (chap. xv. 18), "the great and holy temple" (chap. xiv. 31), "the temple renowned all the world over" (chap. ii. 22), "the temple honoured over all the world" (chap. iii. 12), and "the most holy temple of all the world" (chap. v. 15). He places the pollution of the Temple in the forefront of his history (chap. i. 8); relates at length the various attempts made, successful and unsuccessful, to plunder its treasures (chap. iii. 6–35; iv. 32, 39; v. 15–21); triumphantly sets forth its recovery (chap. x. 1–8), and winds up with an elaborate account of its deliverance when it was threatened with destruction by Nicanor (chap. xiv. 31–36; xv. 17–36). With the Temple he constantly couples the altar (chaps. ii. 19; iv. 14; vi. 4, 5; x. 1–3; xiv. 33), where he represents the priests as serving (chaps. iv. 14; xv. 31) in their "holy vestments" (chap. iii. 15) with a continual "service of sacrifices" (chap. iii. 3). The incense, lights, and shewbread of the sanctuary obtain honourable mention from him (chaps. i. 8; x. 3); as do the sabbath (chaps. vi. 11; viii. 26; xii. 38) and the festivals of Pentecost (chap. xii. 32), Tabernacles (chap. x. 6), Purim (chap. xv. 36), and Dedication (chaps. i. 9, 18; ii. 16; x. 5–8). His anxiety that the Feast of the Dedication should be kept by his countrymen in Egypt seems to be the only reason that can be assigned for his prefixing the two letters (chaps. i. 1—ii. 18) to his narrative. He is further especially regardful of the "holy vessels," the conversion of which to profane uses he regards as "sacrilege" (chap. iv. 39), and as bringing a terrible judgment on those who are guilty of it (chaps. iv. 42; v. 16; ix. 16).

Digitized by Microsoft ®

CHRONOLOGICAL SCHEME OF THE HISTORY CONTAINED IN THE FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF MACCABEES.

B.C.		1 Macc.	2 Macc.
336—323	Reign of Alexander the Great	ch. i. 1–7
323—187	Reigns of Alexander's successors down to Seleucus IV.	ch. i. 8, 9
187—176	Reign of Seleucus IV. Attempt of Heliodorus	..	ch. iii. 1 to iv. 6
176	Accession of Antiochus Epiphanes	ch. i. 10	ch. iv. 7
176—171	Reign of Antiochus until his first expedition into Egypt	ch. i. 10–17	ch. iv. 7–50
171—170	First expedition of Antiochus into Egypt	ch. i. 17–20	ch. v. 1–11
170	Plundering of the Temple by Antiochus	ch. i. 20–24	ch. v. 11–21
170—168	Oppressive rule of Philip	ch. i. 24–28	ch. v. 22, 23
168	Massacre of Apollonius and desecration of the Temple.	ch. i. 29–59	ch. v. 24 to vi. 9
168—167	Cruel persecution under Philip	ch. i. 60–64	ch. vi. 10 to vii. 42
167	Revolt and war under Mattathias	ch. ii. 1–70
166—165	War continued under Judas Maccabeus	ch. iii. 1–26	ch. viii. 1–8
166—165	Expedition under Nicanor and Gorgias	ch. iii. 27 to iv. 27	ch. viii. 9–36
165—164	First expedition under Lysias	ch. iv. 26–35.	(ch. xi. 1–38?)
165—164	Recovery and purification of Temple by Judas	ch. iv. 36–59.	ch. x. 1–8
165—164	Fortification of Jerusalem and Bethsura	ch. iv. 60, 61
164—163	War of Judas in Idumæa and Gilead	ch. v. 1–68	ch. x. 14–38; xii. 10–45
164—163	Death of Epiphanes and accession of Eupator	ch. vi. 1–16	ch. ix. 1–29
163—162	Second expedition under Lysias	ch. vi. 17–63.	ch. xiii. 1–26
162	Death of Eupator and accession of Demetrius I.	ch. vii. 1–3	ch. xiv. 1, 2
162	Establishment of Alcimus as High Priest	ch. vii. 4–25	ch. xiv. 3–14
162—161	Expedition of Nicanor	ch. vii. 26–50	ch. xiv. 15 to xv. 37
161	Embassy sent by Judas to the Romans	ch. viii. 1–32	ch. iv. 11
161—160	Expedition of Bacchides and death of Judas	ch. ix. 1–22
160—159	War of Bacchides with Jonathan	ch. ix. 23–57
158—157	Second expedition of Bacchides against Jonathan	ch. ix. 58–72
157—152	Jonathan rules in peace at Michmash	ch. ix. 73
152	Invasion of Syria by Alexander Balas	ch. x. 1
152—151	Civil war between Alexander and Demetrius	ch. x. 2–49
151	Death of Demetrius	ch. x 50
151—150	Meeting of Jonathan with Demetrius and Ptolemy	ch. x. 51–66
148—147	Invasion of Syria by Demetrius II.	ch. x. 67
148—147	War of Jonathan with Apollonius	ch. x. 68–89
147—146	Civil war between Balas and Demetrius II.	ch. xi. 1–18
146—145	Death of Balas and accession of Demetrius II.	ch. xi. 19
146—145	Civil war between Demetrius II. and Tryphon	ch. xi. 39–56
145	Victory of Jonathan near Hazor	ch. xi. 63–74
145—144	Embassies sent by Jonathan to Rome and Sparta	ch. xii. 1–23
144	War of Jonathan with Tryphon	ch. xii. 39–53
144—143	Death of Jonathan and accession of Simon	ch. xiii. 1–23
142	Judæan independence acknowledged	ch. xiii. 34–42
141	Simon takes Gazara and the Acra	ch. xiii. 43–53
141—140	Demetrius II. makes war on Arsaces.	ch. xiv. 1, 2
139—138	Demetrius taken prisoner.	ch. xiv. 3
139—138	Antiochus Sidetes invades Syria	ch. xv. 1–14
138—137	Sidetes breaks faith with Simon	ch. xv. 25–36
138—137	Expedition of Cendebæus against Simon	ch. xv. 38 to xvi. 10
136—135	Murder of Simon by Ptolemy, son of Abubus	ch. xvi. 11–17

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE SECOND BOOK

OF THE MACCABEES.

CHAPTER I.

1 A letter of the Jews from Jerusalem to them of Egypt, to thank God for the death of Antiochus. 19 Of the fire that was hid in the pit. 24 The prayer of Neemias.

cir. 144. THE brethren, the Jews that be at Jerusalem and in the land of Judea, wish unto the brethren, the Jews that are throughout Egypt, health and peace:

2 God be gracious unto you, and remember his covenant that he made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, his faithful servants;

3 And give you all an heart to serve him, and to do his will,

CHAPTER I.

§ 1. First Letter of the Palestinian Jews to the Brethren in Egypt.

1–9. The main narrative, contained in chs. iii.–xv., is preceded by a sort of "preface" or "introduction," consisting of two parts. First come two letters supposed to have been written by the Jews of Palestine to their brethren in Egypt—one in the reign of Demetrius Nicator, about B.C. 144, and the other under Judas Maccabæus (v. 10), probably about B.C. 165. These letters occupy ch. i. and ch. ii. as far as v. 18. The writer then (in ch. ii. 19–32) explains the circumstances under which the remainder of the work was composed. There is great reason to doubt the genuineness of both the letters, which, however, the author probably found among the Jewish archives in Egypt, and which his simplicity prevented him from suspecting. The relation of the letters to the remainder of the work, and the author's object in inserting them, are somewhat obscure.

1. The brethren.] Moses had enjoined on the Israelites, even in Egypt, to regard each other as "brethren" (Acts vii. 26). The term is used in the Old Testament of Israelites generally (Ex. ii. 11; Ps. cxxxiii. 1: Tobit i. 10, 16; iv. 13; xiv. 4, 7, &c.); but not with the same frequency with which it is applied to Christians in the New Testament.

the Jews that are throughout Egypt.] After Alexandria, Leontopolis was probably the place where there were most Jews in Egypt (Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xiii. 3, § 1–3). There were colonies of them also in other cities (Is. xix. 18; Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 1).

health and peace.] A combination of the Greek with the Hebrew idiom. In the letter of Jonathan (1 Macc. xii. 6) the Greek idiom only is used; in the second letter of the Palestinian Jews (v. 10) the Greek and Roman idioms are combined.

2. God be gracious unto you.] Compare Gen. xliii. 29; Num. vi. 25; Ps. lxvii. 1; Mal. i. 9.

and remember his covenant.] The covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was threefold:—1. To multiply their seed as the stars of heaven; 2. To give their seed Canaan as their inheritance; 3. To bring it to pass, that in their seed all the families of the earth should be blessed. (See Gen. xii. 3; xv. 13–21; xvii. 2–8; xviii. 18, &c.) When the Israelites angered God and He punished them, He was said to "forget His covenant;" when they humbled themselves, and returned to Him, He was said to "remember" it (Lev. xxvi. 42–45; Ps. cvi. 45; Ezek. xvi. 60; Luke i. 72).

his faithful servants.] It is the chief praise of a "servant" to be "found faithful" (1 Cor. iv. 2). The faithfulness of Abraham is declared in 1 Macc. ii. 52 and Heb. xi. 8–19; that of Isaac in Heb. xi. 20; that of Jacob in Heb. xi. 21. Though not without faults, they clung to God till their life's end.

3. to do his will.] Literally, "His wills" or "wishes" (τὰ θελήματα αὐτοῦ). Compare Ps. ciii. 7 in the Sept. Version.

Digitized by Microsoft®

with a good courage and a willing mind;

4 And open your hearts in his law and commandments, and send you peace,

5 And hear your prayers, and be at one with you, and never forsake you in time of trouble.

6 And now we be here praying for you.

7 What time as Demetrius reigned, cir. 144. in the hundred threescore and ninth year, we the Jews wrote unto you in the extremity of trouble that came upon us in those years, from the time that [a]Jason and his company [a] ch. 4. 7. revolted from the holy land and kingdom,

8 And burned the porch, and shed innocent blood: then we prayed unto the Lord, and were heard; we offered also sacrifices and fine flour, and lighted the lamps, and set forth the loaves.

with a good courage.] Literally, "with a large heart"—i.e. "earnestly, heartily, with might and main."

a willing mind.] Rather, "a willing soul."

4. And open your hearts in his law.] This is an unusual phrase. It is best explained as a prayer, that God would open their hearts to attend to His law and commandments. Cf. Acts xvi. 14.

5. and be at one with you.] Rather, "and be reconciled to you." The doctrine of "reconciliation" is one on which the author pointedly and frequently insists. (See ch. v. 20; vii. 33; viii. 39, &c.) According to his view, God, the offended party, requires to be "reconciled" to man, the offender; in the New Testament, it is rather man, the offender, who has to be "reconciled" to the God whom he has offended (Rom. v. 10; 2 Cor. v. 18–20; Col. i. 20, 21, &c.).

and never forsake you.] Compare Ps. xxxviii. 21; lxxi. 9. Sometimes God forsakes His own "for a small moment" (Is. liv. 7), but only to return and have mercy upon them, and "gather them with great mercies" (ibid.).

6. we be here praying for you.] I.e. "Be assured that we, here in Jerusalem, continue always to pray (ἐσμεν προσευχόμενοι) for you."

7. What time as Demetrius reigned, in the hundred threescore and ninth year.] Demetrius II. (Nicator) was king of Syria from the 167th Seleucid year (1 Macc. xi. 19) to the 175th, and again from the 186th to the 189th. He would seem to be the king intended. The 169th Seleucid year began in Oct. B.C. 144, and terminated in Oct. B.C. 143. It was the year in which Jonathan was taken prisoner by Tryphon (1 Macc. xii. 48) and murdered (ib. xiii. 23).

we the Jews wrote unto you.] Rather, "have written." The use of the perfect tense shews that we have here the professed date of the epistle (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 468, note 3); not, as Grimm supposes, a reference to an earlier communication. In that case the aorist must have been employed.

in the extremity of trouble that came upon us in those years.] Rather, "in these years."

from the time that Jason and his company revolted.] On Jason and his doings, see ch. iv. 7–26. Josephus says that his real name was Joshua ('Ιησοῦς), and that he himself changed his name into Jason ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 5, § 1).

from the holy land and kingdom.] Rather, "from the holy land, and from the kingdom." The "holy land" is undoubtedly Palestine—the "land of promise"—the ἱερὰ χώρα of Philo ('Leg. ad Cai.' § 42). "The kingdom," κατ' ἐξοχήν, is probably "the kingdom of God upon earth," or the Jewish Church, which had become an actual earthly kingdom, before our author wrote.

8. And burned the porch.] The principal porch of the Temple building (1 Kings vi. 3) seems to be intended; but we have not elsewhere any special mention of injury done to this particular part of the edifice. All the outer gates were burnt (1 Macc. iv. 38; 2 Macc. viii. 32), and the main building was made a desolation (1 Macc. i. 39; ii. 8; iii. 45, 51; iv. 38): but it may be doubted if any wanton injury was done to the Great Porch. The Temple, it must be remembered, was, in the designs of Epiphanes, to have become a heathen sanctuary (2 Macc. vi. 2).

and shed innocent blood.] See ch. iv. 34–36; v. 6; vi. 10, 18–31; vii. 1–42, &c.

we offered also sacrifices and fine flour.] The reference is probably to the recovery of the Temple by Judas Maccabæus, and the restoration of sacrifices made by him in the year B.C. 166 (1 Macc. iv. 36–53)—the occasion ever after celebrated by the "Feast of the Dedication" (ἐγκαίνια).

and lighted the lamps, and set forth the loaves.] See 1 Macc. 50, 51. The "lamps" were those of the candelabrum which supplied

Digitized by Microsoft®

9 And now see that ye keep the feast
[b] Lev. 23. 34. of [b]tabernacles in the month Casleu.
10 In the hundred fourscore and eighth year, the people that were at Jerusalem and in Judea, and the council, and Judas, sent greeting and health unto Aristobulus, king Ptolemeus' master, who was of the stock of the anointed priests, and to the Jews that were in Egypt:
11 Insomuch as God hath delivered us from great perils, we thank him highly, as having been in battle against a king.
12 For he cast them out that fought within the holy city.

the place of the original golden candlestick (Ex. xxv. 31–37): the "loaves," those of the table of shewbread (ib. 23–30).

9. the feast of tabernacles.] The writer tells us further on (ch. x. 6) that the Feast of Dedication was kept on the first occasion "after the manner of the Feast of Tabernacles," with "branches, and fair boughs, and palms also" (ib. v. 7). From this circumstance it seems to have been sometimes called "the Feast of Tabernacles in the month Chisleu," while the true Tabernacles' Feast was known as "the Feast of Tabernacles in the month Tisri" (Grimm).

the month Casleu.] This month corresponded, in part, to our December; in part, to January. It was the ninth month of the Jewish year (1 Macc. iv. 52). In the Hebrew it was called Chisleu (Neh. i. 1; Zech. vii. 1). The celebration of the Feast of Dedication by the Egyptian Jews, enjoined both here and in v. 18, would have been an acknowledgment on their part of a higher sanctity belonging to the Temple at Jerusalem than to that at Leontopolis.

§ 2. ANOTHER (EARLIER) LETTER OF THE PALESTINIAN JEWS TO THEIR BRETHREN IN EGYPT.

FIRST PORTION OF THE LETTER (vv. 10–17). The death of Antiochus is the first subject treated of in the second letter. This event, which happened in B.C. 164, is related with details, which are irreconcilable with the narrative of the same event in ch. ix. 1–28, and also with that in 1 Macc. vi. 1–16.

10. In the hundred fourscore and eighth year.] This would be B.C. 125–4, thirty-six years after the death of Judas Maccabeus, by whom the letter is said to have been sent, and nearly forty years after the death of Epiphanes, which is represented as the occasion of its having been written. As so large a chronological error is scarcely possible, we may perhaps accept the reading of two MSS., viz. 148 for 188. The professed date of the letter will then be B.C. 165–4.

the people . . . the council, and Judas.] The order is unusual, and tends to throw doubt on the genuineness of the letter. The natural order would be "Judas, and the council, and the people." Compare 1 Macc. xii. 6. The existence of a Jewish council, or "senate," at this time has been questioned (Grimm), but without reason. A senate is mentioned in 1 Macc. l. s. c.; 2 Macc. iv. 44, xi. 27.

Aristobulus, king Ptolemeus' master.] Rather, "teacher." Aristobulus, the Peripatetic philosopher, is undoubtedly meant. He held a high position at the court of Ptolemy Philometor during the first half of the second century B.C., being at once tutor to the king and the chief of the Jewish community at Alexandria. His work, 'Explanations of the Mosaic Law,' was addressed to Ptolemy himself, and is quoted by Clement of Alexandria ('Strom.' i. p. 342) and Eusebius ('Præp. Ev.' vii. 13, viii. 8–10, ix. 6, xiii. 11; 'Eccles. Hist.' vii. 33), and referred to by Origen ('Contr. Celsum,' iv. 6, § 4). He endeavoured to reconcile the Hebrew Scriptures with the philosophy of Aristotle. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 259; Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 277–280.)

11. God hath delivered us from great perils.] See 1 Macc. iii. 10–60; iv. 1–35; v. 1–61.

as having been in battle against a king.] Rather, "as fighting frequently against the king." The present participle gives the sense of repetition: the word βασιλεύς, without the article, designates the Seleucid monarch here, as it does the Persian monarch in the classical writers. The Jews had not been actually engaged in battle with Antiochus; but they had had at least five engagements with his generals. And the war was still continuing.

12. he cast them out that fought within the holy city.] Rather, "He Himself"—i.e. God—"cast them out," &c. Compare ch. x. 1. According to the author of this Book, Judas recovered both the Temple and the city, in which case of course the Syrian garrison must have been "cast out" of the latter. But the circumstantial narrative of the First Book shews that the "city of David," with its fortress, the Acra, did not really fall into the hands of the Jews until the principate of Simon (1 Macc. iv. 37–60; xiii. 49–51; xiv. 36, 37; Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. pp. 311–12, and p. 335).

Digitized by Microsoft®

13 For when the leader was come into Persia, and the army with him that seemed invincible, they were slain in the temple of Nanea by the deceit of Nanea's priests.

14 For Antiochus, as though he would marry her, came into the place, and his friends that were with him, to receive money in name of a dowry.

15 Which when the priests of Nanea had set forth, and he was entered with a small company into the compass of the temple, they shut the temple as soon as Antiochus was come in:

16 And opening a privy door of the roof, they threw stones like thunderbolts, and struck down the captain, hewed them in pieces, smote off their heads, and cast them to those that were without.

17 Blessed be our God in all things, who hath delivered up the ungodly.

13. the leader.] This can only be Antiochus; but it is a curious term to be used of the Great King.

into Persia.] Elymaïs, the country in which the temple of Nanæa was situated, appears to have been reckoned at this period a part of Persia. (See 1 Macc. vi. 1.)

the army . . . that seemed invincible.] Half the forces of Syria, according to the author of the First Book (1 Macc. iii. 37)—probably from 60,000 to 70,000 men. (See 1 Macc. iv. 28.)

they were slain.] Literally, "cut to pieces." This is an over-statement. Antiochus himself was certainly not killed in the Temple, or anywhere near it (1 Macc. vi. 4–16; Polyb. xxxi. 2), nor does it seem that he lost many of his troops. Lysias brought back with him the bulk of the force when he returned to Antioch (1 Macc. vi. 56).

in the temple of Nanea.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 2; Polyb. l. s. c.; App. 'Syriac.' § 66. The Syrian goddess, Nanea, or Nanæa, was identical with the Nana of the Babylonians, who was called Ishtar in Assyria and Ashtoreth (or Astarte) in Phœnicia. She is commonly identified with the Aphrodité of the Greeks and the Venus of the Romans, but is sometimes compared with Artemis and Diana. Variant forms of the name are Nanæa, Anæa, Anaïtis, Tanata, Tanath, Tanaïs. The Egyptians, on adopting her into their system, called her Anta. In Phœnician inscriptions Tanath is found, as well as Ashtoreth.

14. Antiochus, as though he would marry her.] The employment of this pretext by the needy monarch when he was plundering temples is confirmed by the recently discovered fragments of Granius Licinianus (p. 9; ed. of 1858); and receives illustration from Antony's conduct at Athens, as related by Seneca: "Quum Antonius vellet se Liberum patrem dici, et hoc nomen statuis suis subscribi juberet, habitu quoque et comitatu Liberum imitaretur, occurrerunt venienti ei Athenienses et Διόνυσον salutaverunt. . . . Dixerunt, despondere ipsos in matrimonium Minervam suam, et rogaverunt ut duceret. Ac Antonius ait ducturum, sed dotis nomine imperare se illis mille talenta" ('Suasor.' § 1).

15. when . . . he was entered . . . into the compass of the temple.] Rather, "When he was entered within the circuit of the precinct." Ὁ περίβολος τοῦ τεμένους is the wall that surrounded the enclosure within which the Temple stood.

16. opening a privy door of the roof.] In the original it is "the privy door," as if every temple had one.

they threw stones . . . and struck down.] Compare the proceedings of the Corcyræan democrats when they mounted on the roof of the building within which they had confined the chief aristocrats, and, after breaking a hole in the roof, destroyed them by hurling down on them darts, javelins, and pieces of the tiling wherewith the roof was covered (Thucyd. iv. 48).

the captain.] Or "the leader"—the same word as in v. 13. Antiochus is no doubt meant.

hewed them in pieces.] As there is no antecedent to "them," it has been suggested that some such words as καὶ τοὺς μετ' αὐτοῦ —"and those with him"—have fallen out after "captain."

17. who hath delivered up the ungodly.] Rather, "who delivered up those that had committed impiety,"—i.e. Antiochus and his soldiers. That the entire narrative is a fiction, so far as Antiochus Epiphanes is concerned, cannot be questioned; but it is quite possible, as Scholz has suggested, that it describes the fate of Antiochus the Great, who was killed while plundering a temple of Belus in this same region (Diod. Sic. p. 573; Justin. xxxii. 2; Strab. xvi. 1, § 18).

SECOND PORTION OF THE SECOND LETTER (vv. 18–36). From their account of the death of Antiochus, the writers of the letter are represented as proceeding to enjoin upon their Egyptian brethren the celebration of two

Digitized by Microsoft®

18 Therefore whereas we are now purposed [c] to keep the purification of the temple upon the five and twentieth day of the month [d] Casleu, we thought it necessary to certify you thereof, that ye also might keep it, as the feast of the tabernacles, and of the fire, which was given us when Neemias offered sacrifice, after that he had builded the temple and the altar.

[c] 1 Mac. 4. 59. ch. 2. 16.
[d] Lev. 23. 24, 27, 34. Numb. 29. 1.

19 For when our fathers were led into Persia, the priests that were then devout took the fire of the altar privily, and hid it in an hollow place of a pit without water, where they kept it sure, so that the place was unknown to all men.

20 Now after many years, when it pleased God, Neemias, being sent from the king of Persia, did send of the posterity of those priests that had hid it to the fire: but when they told us they found no fire, but thick water;

21 Then commanded he them to draw it up, and to bring it; and when the sacrifices were laid on, days—1. That of the Dedication of the Temple by Judas Maccabeus after his purification of it; and 2. That of Nehemiah's recovery of the sacred fire. The legend of the recovery is then given at length.

18. whereas we are now purposed to keep, &c.] The second celebration of the festival at Jerusalem is probably intended, since the first preceded the death of Epiphanes, as appears from 1 Macc. iv. 52 compared with 1 Macc. vi. 16.

we thought it necessary.] Rather, "we thought it fitting."

that ye also might keep it as the feast of the tabernacles.] Rather, "that ye might keep the day of the Tabernacles' feast." The writers call the Feast of the Dedication itself σκηνοπηγία, as did those of the previous letter (v. 9). For the reason of the name see the comment on that place.

the fire which was given us.] Our translators have supplied the clause, "which was given us," from the Vulgate. Something must certainly have fallen out after "fire"—perhaps τοῦ εὑρεθέντος or τοῦ φανέντος.

after that he had builded the temple and the altar.] This is a curious perversion of history, and indicates a great ignorance of Holy Scripture on the part of the writer of the letter. The altar was set up, and the Temple built by Zerubbabel, nearly a century before the time of Nehemiah (Ezra iii. 3, vi. 15; Zech. iv. 9). Nehemiah's work was the restoration of the gates and walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 1–32, vi. 1, vii. 1; Ecclus. xlix. 13). A further exaggeration of Nehemiah's greatness appears in ch. ii. 13.

19. when our fathers were led into Persia.] I.e. into Babylonia, which was afterwards swallowed up in Persia.

the priests . . . took the fire of the altar privily, and hid it.] There is no reason to suppose any truth at all in this narrative, which is entirely unsupported by anything contained in the canonical Books. Had the fire been preserved, it is almost certain that either Jeremiah, or Ezra, or the writer of Kings, or the writer of Chronicles, would have recorded it.

in an hollow place of a pit without water.] A tradition which can be traced back to the tenth century gives to the well at the conjunction of the Kedron with the Hinnom valley—the En-rogel of holy Scripture—the name of "the well of Nehemiah," with allusion to this story. Such traditions are however worthless, unless they have a very much greater antiquity than can be claimed for this.

where they kept it sure.] Rather, "where they made it sure,"—i.e. concealed it safely.

20. Neemias, being sent from the king of Persia.] The king who "sent" Nehemiah, or rather allowed him to go, to Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 4–6) was Artaxerxes, the son of Xerxes and grandson of Darius Hystaspis, who was known to the Greeks as Macrocheir and to the Romans as Longimanus.

when they told us.] The pronoun of the first person seems very much out of place, the professed date of the letter being nearly three centuries after Nehemiah's time. Gaab explains it as equivalent to "our countrymen." Grimm supposes the authors of the letter to quote from a document purporting to have been written by eye-witnesses of the events narrated. But in that case the first person would probably have occurred oftener. I should suspect that the ησαν of διεσάφησαν was first repeated by a clumsy scribe, and then turned by a corrector into ἡμῖν. I should omit the ἡμῖν, as is done by two MSS. and the Syriac Version.

21. to draw it up and to bring it.] Rather, "to draw of it (ἀποβάψαντας) and bring it."

when the sacrifices were laid on.] I.e. "placed on the altar."

Digitized by Microsoft®

Neemias commanded the priests to sprinkle the wood and the things laid thereupon with the water.

22 When this was done, and the time came that the sun shone, which afore was hid in the cloud, there was a great fire kindled, so that every man marvelled.

23 And the priests made a prayer whilst the sacrifice was consuming, I say, both the priests, and all the rest, Jonathan beginning, and the rest answering thereunto, as Neemias did.

24 And the prayer was after this manner; O Lord, Lord God, Creator of all things, who art fearful and strong, and righteous, and merciful, and the only and gracious King,

25 The only giver of all things, the only just, almighty, and everlasting, thou that deliverest Israel from all trouble, and didst choose the fathers, and sanctify them:

22. there was a great fire kindled.] The acceptance of the entire story of the recovery of the holy fire by Joseph Ben-Gorion ('Hist. Jud.' i. 16, 17) does not add anything to its credibility. Ben-Gorion is aware that the altar was set up, and sacrifice renewed by Zerubbabel and Jeshua, and assigns them a place in the transactions; but he spoils his story by introducing into it also the names of Ezra and Nehemiah, who lived nearly a century later. The Rabbinical writers generally ignore the story; and indeed contradict it by their almost unanimous declaration that "the holy fire" was one of the five things possessed by the first Temple which were wanting in the second. (See Buxtorf's treatise 'De igne sacro' in Ugolino's 'Thesaurus,' vol. x. p. 426.)

23. Jonathan beginning.] The "Jonathan" intended is probably the high-priest of that name mentioned in Neh. xii. 11, and called by Josephus "John" ('A. J.' xi. 7, § 1), who was the grandson of Eliashib and the father of Jaddua. The writer of the letter may have supposed that he was contemporary with Nehemiah, whereas his high-priesthood must really have fallen about half a century later. By "beginning" is meant pronouncing each clause of the prayer first, so that the people might hear it and repeat it after him.

24. the prayer was after this manner.] The accumulation of epithets in the address to God (vv. 24, 25) is the most remarkable feature of this prayer. The simplicity of early times was content to address God by one or two titles (Ex. v. 22, xv. 11, xxxii. 11; Num. xvi. 22; 2 Chron. vi. 14, 16, &c.). From the time of Daniel (Dan. ix. 4), three or four are common (Neh. i. 5; Judith ix. 12; Add. Esth. xiii. 9; Ecclus. li. 1). The prayer ascribed to Manasseh has eleven, and the address of Jonathan in the present passage fifteen. The particular epithets are, for the most part, such as occur separately elsewhere.

O Lord, Lord God.] This is not a mere repetition, such as we find in Ps. xxii. 1; Add. Esth. xiii. 9; 3 Macc. ii. 2; Matt. vii. 21, &c., but a strengthened form of address, like "O Lord, O Lord my God," in the Psalms (xxv. 1, 2; xxxv. 22, 24; lxxi. 1, 4, &c.).

Creator of all things.] Compare 3 Macc. ii. 2, and Prayer of Manasses, v. 2.

who art fearful and strong, and righteous, and merciful.] Literally, "the fearful, and strong, and righteous, and merciful one"—i.e. the only Being really possessed of those qualities. God is addressed as "fearful" (or "terrible") by Daniel (ch. ix. 4), and Nehemiah (ch. i. 5); as "righteous" by David (Ps. cxix. 137) and Ezra (ch. ix. 15); as "strong" by Job (ix. 19) and again by David (Ps. lxxxix. 8), and as "very merciful" by Manasseh (Prayer, v. 5). The order of the epithets is that of moral climax.

the only and gracious King.] Rather, "who alone art King and gracious."

25. The only giver of all things.] Or, "the only supplier of things needed." The word used (χορηγὸς) designates the person who supplied whatever was necessary to put an author's play upon the stage.

the only just, almighty, and everlasting.] Omnipotence and eternal existence (i.e. existence without either beginning or end) are by common consent attributes which belong to God alone. Justice or righteousness is, in a certain qualified sense, predicable of man (Job i. 1, 8; Ps. vii. 8; Ezek. xviii. 9; Matt. i. 19); but in the truest and highest sense of God only. (See Matt. xix. 17: "There is none good but one, that is, God.") that deliverest Israel from all trouble.] Compare Ps. xxxiv. 17.

and didst choose the fathers.] Literally, "and didst make the fathers [Thy] chosen ones." The true Israelites are called God's "elect" in Is. lxv. 9, 15, 22, in a spiritual, and not merely in a temporal, sense; but here the election intended is probably the choice of Israel out of all the nations of the earth to

Digitized by Microsoft®

26 Receive the sacrifice for thy whole people Israel, and preserve thine own portion, and sanctify it.

27 Gather those together that are scattered from us, deliver them that serve among the heathen, look upon them that are despised and abhorred, and let the heathen know that thou art our God.

28 Punish them that oppress us, and with pride do us wrong.

[e] Deut. 30. ch. 2. 18. 29 Plant thy people again in thy holy place, [e] as Moses hath spoken.

30 And the priests sung psalms of thanksgiving.

31 Now when the sacrifice was consumed, Neemias commanded the water that was left to be poured on the great stones.

32 When this was done, there was kindled a flame: but it was consumed by the light that shined from the altar.

33 So when this matter was known, it was told the king of Persia, that in the place, where the priests that were led away had hid the fire, there appeared water, and that [‖] Neemias had purified the sacrifices therewith.

[‖] Or, Neemias his company

34 Then the king, inclosing the place, made it holy, after he had tried the matter.

be God's "peculiar people" (Deut. xiv. 2). The aorist marks a single act of choice.

26. Receive the sacrifice for thy whole people.] Compare Lev. ix. 15–18; Ezra vi. 17; Neh. x. 33, &c.

preserve thine own portion.] "The Lord's portion is His people" (Deut. xxxii. 9)—that "portion" of the world's inhabitants which He chose and set apart for Himself. (Compare Add. Esth. xiii. 16; Ecclus. xvii. 17, xxiv. 12; 3 Macc. vi. 3.)

27. those . . . that are scattered from us.] Literally, "our dispersion" (τὴν διασπορὰν ἡμῶν)—the abstract for the concrete. Compare the Sept. translation of Ps. cxlvi. 2, and see also John vii. 35; Jas. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1. The word came gradually to be used in a technical sense of the Jews dispersed throughout the world. Jonathan's prayer, so far, is not inappropriate to the supposed time and circumstances, since, though many had returned with Zerubbabel, a still greater number had remained behind (Joseph. 'A. J.' xi. 1, § 3), and continued scattered among the nations.

deliver them that serve.] The prayer now becomes inappropriate. Cyrus had given a general permission to leave their homes to all Israelites in any part of his dominions and return to Palestine (Ezra i. 2–4). Artaxerxes, in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, renewed the permission (ib. vii. 13). No Israelites could, under these circumstances, be detained in slavery against their will in any part of the Persian Empire, and there is no reason to suppose that any had been carried beyond it. The remainder of the prayer is also pitched in too low a key to suit the time of the Return from the Captivity.

29. Plant thy people again.] Compare Ex. xv. 17; 2 Sam. vii. 10; Ps. xliv. 2, lxxx. 8, &c.

as Moses hath spoken.] See Deut. xxx. 1–5, and compare Neh. i. 8, 9; Baruch ii. 28–34.

30. And the priests sung psalms of thanksgiving.] Rather, "And the priests proceeded to sing the psalms." When the prayer was ended, the priests followed on with the chanting of the usual psalms. Compare Ezra iii. 11; 1 Macc. iv. 24; and see the comment on the latter passage. Of course the psalms would be "psalms of thanksgiving;" but our author does not say so.

31. Neemias commanded the water that was left to be poured on the great stones.] The existing Greek text will in no way bear this meaning, since it has κατασχεῖν, and not καταχεῖν. If we retain the reading of the MSS., we must translate—"Nehemiah commanded the water that was left to be confined by means of great stones;" literally, "that great stones should confine it." Our translation follows the Vulgate, which has—"Ex residua aqua jussit Neemias lapides majores profundi." This involves the reading καταχεῖν, and requires further the insertion of ἐπὶ before λίθους.

33. there appeared water.] Rather, "there had appeared."

Neemias.] Rather, "Neemias and those who were with him." The idiom employed, which belongs to the best Greek, is a favourite one with the author. (See ch. x. 16, 25, 33; xi. 6; xii. 11, 14, 15, 36; xiii. 1, 23; xiv. 18; xv. 1, 6, 25, 26, &c.)

34. the king, inclosing the place, made it holy.] This is another indication that the whole story is a fable. A Persian king would have been very unlikely to have taken any notice of what would have seemed to him so small a matter as that related in the text.

Digitized by Microsoft®

35 And the king took many gifts, and bestowed thereof on those whom he would gratify.

36 And Neemias called this thing Naphthar, which is as much as to say, a cleansing: but many men call it Nephi.

CHAPTER II.

1 What Jeremy the prophet did. 5 How he hid the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar. 13 What Neemias and Judas wrote. 20 What Jason wrote in five books: 25 and how those were abridged by the author of this book.

IT is also found in the records, that Jeremy the prophet commanded them that were carried away to take of the fire, [a] as it hath been signified: [a] ch. 1. 19.

2 And how that the prophet, having given them the law, charged them not to forget the commandments of the Lord, and that they should not err in their minds, [b] when they see images of silver and gold, with their ornaments. [b] Baruch 6. 4.

3 And with other such speeches exhorted he them, that the law should not depart from their hearts.

4 It was also contained in the same writing, that the prophet being

36. Neemias called this thing Naphthar, which is as much as to say, a cleansing.] The MSS. vary between "Nephthar," "Nephthai," and "Nephtha." No word at all near to any of these forms has the meaning of "a cleansing" in Hebrew. It has been conjectured that the original word used was nithkâr, which might perhaps have this meaning; but more probably the etymology of the forger of the letter was at fault, and he gave a fanciful explanation of a word whose true meaning was unknown to him. "Naphtha" was the name given by the Greeks to a form of mineral oil produced in many parts of Persia, which was highly inflammable; and it is this Greek term which the author of the letter intended to use. Perhaps he mis-spelt it; or perhaps it was corrupted by the copyists, first into "Nephtha," and then further into "Nephthar."

many men.] Rather, "most men."

CHAPTER II.

THIRD PORTION OF THE SECOND LETTER (vv. 1–8). As a sequel to the story of the Holy Fire, the pretended writers of the letter give, professedly from certain records (ἀπογραφαί) which they have consulted, an account of the doings of Jeremiah at the time of the Captivity: how he gave orders for the preservation of the fire (v. 1), warned the captives against idolatry (v. 2), and concealed in a cave on the top of Mount Pisgah the Tabernacle (!), the Ark of the Covenant, and the Altar of incense (vv. 3–5), where he declared that they would remain until the final restoration of Israel (vv. 6–8).

1. It is also found in the records.] It is impossible to say what "records" are referred to, or whether the writer of the letter had really any documents in his possession which contained the legends here set forth. Certainly the later Maccabean time was one in which "the unhistorical spirit grew rapidly and dangerously" (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 460); and, among the many apocryphal writings of the period, there may have been some which pretended to be "records" kept during the Captivity; but the unlikelihood of such records having been kept in such a time of trouble is patent, and their presumed contents do not lend them any credit.

Jeremy the prophet commanded.] Jeremiah at the time of the Captivity was in no position to "command" anyone. He was shut up in the court of the prison (Jer. xxxviii. 28), and was not released until after the Temple had been destroyed and the prisoners carried off (ib. xxxix. 8–14).

as it hath been signified.] In ch. i. 19.

2. how that the prophet, having given them the law, charged them, &c.] Some formal delivery of a copy of the law by Jeremiah to the captives, and some set address, seem to be intended. But the prophet himself tells us nothing of either. Nebuzaradan, he says, took him in chains with the other prisoners to Ramah, and there struck off his chains; after which he sent him to Gedaliah at Mizpah (Jer. xl. 1–6), while the remainder of the captives proceeded on their way to Babylon.

when they see.] Rather, "when they should see."

images of silver and gold.] Literally, "of gold and silver." The Babylonian images were mainly of the former material. (See Dan. iii. 1, v. 4; Herod. i. 183; Diod. Sic. ii. 9, § 5, &c.)

with their ornaments.] The Babylonian idols had in some instances gold crowns on their heads (Baruch vi. 9). They were also clothed in rich garments (ibid. 11, 33, 58).

4. It was also contained in the same writing.] The past tense—"it was"—is to be explained as a reference to the time when warned of God, commanded the tabernacle and the ark to go with [c] Deut. 32. 49. him, as he went forth into [c] the mountain, where Moses climbed up, and saw the heritage of God.

Digitized by Microsoft®

5 And when Jeremy came thither, he found an hollow cave, wherein he laid the tabernacle, and the ark, and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door.

6 And some of those that followed him came to mark the way, but they could not find it.

7 Which when Jeremy perceived, he blamed them, saying, As for that place, it shall be unknown until the time that God gather his people again together, and receive them unto mercy.

8 Then shall the Lord shew them these things, and the glory of the Lord shall appear, and the cloud also, [d] as it was shewed under Moses, and [d] Exod. 34. 5. [e] as when Solomon desired that the [e] 1 Kings 8. 10. place might be honourably sanctified.

the pretended writers of the letter consulted the supposed writing.

being warned of God.] Compare Matt. ii. 12. The actual word used for "warning" (χρηματισμός) occurs in the Greek Scriptures only here and in Rom. xi. 4. It is, however, common in classical Greek. (See Polyb. xxviii. 14, § 10; 16, § 4; Lucian, "Gall." 25; Diod. Sic. i. 70, 78, &c.)

the tabernacle.] The "tabernacle" made by Moses, or its representative at the time, was removed from Gibeon to Jerusalem by Solomon (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chr. v. 5) on the occasion of his dedicating the Temple; but what was then done with it is not mentioned in Scripture. The forger of the letter evidently imagines that it was placed inside the Temple, and remained there until the capture of the city by Nebuchadnezzar. But the silence of Scripture makes this very improbable.

to go with him.] Literally, "to follow him"—i.e. "to be carried after him." So Ælian says that the Choaspes water "followed" Xerxes ('Var. Hist.' xii. 40). By what right or power Jeremiah gave these orders, and got them executed, the author does not explain.

the mountain where Moses climbed up.] See Deut. xxxiv. 1. This mount was probably made the hiding-place with some reference to the hidden sepulchre of Moses, which was in the vicinity (ib. v. 6).

the heritage of God.] I.e. the land of Canaan, which God had given to Israel for its inheritance (Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 15; xv. 7, &c.).

5. an hollow cave.] Literally, "a cave-like dwelling." The place is so much a "dwelling" that it has a "door."

the altar of incense.] See Ex. xxx. 1–10. It seems strange that this had not been mentioned as carried forth from Jerusalem in v. 4. Probably the legend grew gradually. First, the tabernacle and the ark only were supposed to have been hidden; then, the golden altar, the most sacred thing in the Temple next to the ark, was added; finally, the list was increased by the addition of the table of shewbread, the golden candlestick, and the sacred utensils generally, as we find it in Syncellus ('Chronograph.' p. 409).

stopped the door.] I.e. "blocked it up," so that it was no longer visible.

6. to mark the way.] I.e. to set up some permanent marks by which it might be possible to find the cavern again and recover the treasures.

7. perceived.] Rather, "learnt."

he blamed them.] Not, as Scholz supposes, for carelessness in neglecting to put up the marks earlier, but for over-care in supposing them needed. God would bring the deposit to light without human aid, when the fitting time came.

until the time that God gather his people again together.] After the return from the Captivity, the Israelites still looked forward to a further gathering in of their brethren from distant countries, and to a great increase in the population of Judæa and Jerusalem. (See Zech. viii. 7, 8, x. 10; and compare the comment on ch. i. 27.)

8. the glory of the Lord shall appear, and the cloud also.] The expectation was of some such visible manifestation of the Divine Presence as is recorded in Ex. xl. 34, 35, and 2 Chr. v. 13, 14; 1 Kings viii. 10, 11, when a luminous cloud, dazzling to beholders, filled the Holy Place, and "the glory of the Lord" was, in a certain sense, revealed to the eyes of men. The expectation rested on passages in the prophets where "the glory of God" was promised to the second Temple in a spiritual sense (Is. lx. 1, 19; Hag. ii. 9; Zech. ii. 5).

FOURTH PORTION OF THE SECOND LETTER (vv. 9–12). The records said to have been consulted by the pretended writers of the letter are now declared to have contained 9 It was also declared, that he being wise [f] offered the sacrifice of dedication, and of the finishing of the temple.

10 And [g] as when Moses prayed unto the Lord, the fire came down from heaven, and consumed the sacrifices: even [h] so prayed Solomon also, and the fire came down from heaven, and consumed the burnt offerings.

11 And [i] Moses said, Because the sin offering was not to be eaten, it was consumed.

12 So Solomon kept those eight days.

13 The same things were also reported in the writings and commentaries of Neemias; and how he founding a library gathered together the [f] 1 Kings 8. 62, &c.

[g] Lev. 9. 23, 24.
[h] 2 Chron. 7. 1.
[i] Lev. 10. 16, &c.

allusion to the two previous occasions on which fire had come down from heaven and consumed the sacrifices laid upon the altar of burnt offering—namely, that in the time of Moses, mentioned in Lev. ix. 24, and that in the time of Solomon, mentioned in 2 Chron. vii. 1, whereby an indication is given ot the purpose for which the holy fire was supposed to have been reserved by Jeremiah, as stated in v. 1.

9. It was also declared.] In the records, supposed to have been consulted by the writers of the letter. (See vv. 1 and 4.)

that he being wise.] "He" is undoubtedly Solomon, the Hebrew ideal of human wisdom (1 Kings iii. 12; iv. 29–34).

offered the sacrifice of dedication.] See 1 Kings viii. 62; 2 Chr. vii. 1. The fact of the miraculous descent of fire from heaven on this occasion has been denied, on account of the silence concerning it maintained by the author of the First Book of Kings; but the denial involves the rejection of the authority of the Books of Chronicles, which are as integral a part of the sacred Volume as any other.

10. as when Moses prayed . . . fire came down from heaven.] See Lev. ix. 24. Moses, however, is not said in Leviticus to have "prayed" for the descent of the fire. The fire fell as he was blessing the people.

11. And Moses said, &c.] No words resembling these are ascribed to Moses in the Old Testament; nor, if they had been, is the appositeness of their quotation in the present connection very apparent. Perhaps some allusion to Lev. x. 16–20 is intended.

12. So Solomon kept those eight days.] That Solomon "kept eight days" was concluded from the mention of "the eighth day" in 1 Kings viii. 66 and 2 Chr. vii. 8; but it is not quite clear that the Festival proper lasted more than seven days. No doubt, however, the ἐγκαίνια of Judas Maccabeus was made an eight days' festival with reference to the supposed duration of the Dedication feast of Solomon.

FIFTH PORTION OF THE SECOND LETTER (vv. 13–16). The object of the pretended writers in this section is directly practical. They make an offer, and they repeat their previous request. Judas Maccabeus, following the example of Nehemiah, has collected a number of the sacred writings of former times which had been lost during the recent troubles; if the Egyptian Jews wish, they can have a portion by sending persons to fetch them. In any case they will do well to keep the Dedication Festival.

13. The same things were also reported.] Literally, "They related also the same things." The past tense is used, as in vv. 4 and 9, with reference to the time when the writers of the letter were supposed to have consulted the document which they profess to quote.

in the writings.] I.e. the "records" of v. 1. The word is nearly, though not quite, the same.

and commentaries.] Rather, "and also in the commentaries." The intention is to quote two entirely distinct works. The "commentaries of Nehemiah" cannot be the Book which has come down to us under his name, or even the original Book whereof that was a part, which comprised our present Book of Ezra, since no such statements as those of ch. ii. 1–12 are made in either of those works. The allusion is probably to an apocryphal book, which did not long survive its composition.

he founding a library.] This is explained by what follows. Nehemiah, or Ezra and Nehemiah in conjunction, took pains to collect together the various sacred writings of the Jews, additional to the Law, such as the Books of the Kings, those of the Prophets, and the writings ascribed to David; to which they added a collection of the letters of the Persian kings respecting their offerings to the Temple. "This earliest tradition with respect to the agglomeration of the sacred Hebrew literature certainly indicates that it was in Nehemiah's time that the various documents of the past history of his race were united in one collection. . . It is evident from the terms of the description that 'Nehemiah's Library' was not co-extensive with any existing volume. It was not a formation of Divine oracles so much as a repository of acts of the kings, and the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts.

Digitized by Microsoft®

14 In like manner also Judas gathered together all those things that ‖were lost by reason of the war we had, and they remain with us.

‖ Or, fell out during the war

15 Wherefore if ye have need thereof, send some to fetch them unto you.

16 Whereas we then [k]are about to celebrate the purification, we have written unto you, and ye shall do well, if ye keep the same days.

[k] ch. i. 18.

17 ‖We hope also, that the God, that delivered all his people, and gave them all an heritage, and the kingdom, and the priesthood, and the sanctuary,

‖ Gr. Now God it is that saved all his people, and rendered the heritage, and the kingdom, and the priesthood, and the sanctuary, a

18 [l]As he promised in the law,

[l] ch. i. 27

he promised in the law: for we hope in God that he will shortly, &c.

whatever materials from whatever source might be useful for the future history of his people." (Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 139, 140.)

the acts of the kings.] Under this designation would be included the Books of Samuel, of Kings, and of Chronicles, if already written; perhaps even the Books of Joshua and Judges.

and of David.] Rather, "and the writings of David," or "the writings ascribed to David," by which the Psalms generally, so far as they extended at the time, but not the entire 'Hagiographa,' would be meant.

the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts.] The "epistles" intended are probably those of the Persian kings Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes, who are known to have made gifts to the Temple (Ezra i. 7–11; vi. 8, 9; vii. 15, 19–22). We have a specimen of the kind of document in the "copy of the letter that the king Artaxerxes gave unto Ezra the priest, the scribe" (ibid. vii. 11–26). The "letter unto Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest" (Neh. ii. 8), may have been included in the collection.

14. In like manner also Judas.] "As Nehemiah," says Dean Stanley, "had agglomerated round the Law the works which had gradually taken form by his time, so Judas Maccabæus and his companions eagerly gathered round Nehemiah's group of sacred literature the scattered remains which had escaped, like fragments of a wreck or survivors of a battle, or 'brands plucked from the fire,' out of the ruin of the Syrian war." ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. pp. 338, 339.)

that were lost.] This expression is somewhat too strong. If they had been "lost," Judas could not have collected them. The word used, διαπεπτωκότα, means "that had fallen through" or "fallen out of knowledge." It is no doubt sometimes used of absolutely "lost" books (Phot. 'Bibliothec.' p. 120, ed. Bekker), but cannot have that sense here.

by reason of the war.] Or, "in the course of the war."

15. Wherefore if ye have need thereof, send, &c.] This offer, even if a fact, and not a fiction, does not shew that the Palestinian Jews possessed a much larger number of sacred writings than the Egyptian ones (Grimm), but only that they regarded it as possible that they might possess some of which the Egyptian Jews had no copies.

16. Whereas we then, &c.] Compare ch. i. 18. To impress upon the Egyptian Jews the importance of keeping the Dedication Feast must be regarded as the principal object of this epistle, whether genuine or not.

SIXTH AND LAST PORTION OF THE SECOND LETTER (vv. 17, 18). The supposed writers conclude with the expression of a pious hope, that, as God has already done so much for them in the way of deliverance and restoration, He will shortly complete His work by bringing the whole nation together out of all lands under the sun into His "holy place," which is now cleansed from pollution.

17. the God that delivered all his people.] The deliverance is that effected by Judas Maccabeus, when, after defeating the generals of Epiphanes, he "recovered the Temple" (ch. x. 1) and "cleansed" it, and restored the daily sacrifice and the regular course of worship. We need not perhaps be surprised if, in the first burst of exultation, the deliverance was spoken of as more complete than the course of after events shewed it to be.

and gave them all an heritage.] I.e. restored the Holy Land to them as their inheritance, after it had been taken from them by the Syrians.

and the kingdom.] Though Judas never assumed the title or state of king, his position was that of an independent ruler, and he might be fairly considered to preside over a "kingdom." He was in fact a king in all but the name.

and the sanctuary.] Rather, "and the cleansing," i.e. the purifying and sanctifying anew of the Temple. (See ch. x. 3, and compare 1 Macc. iv. 43–51.)

18. As he promised in the law.] The

Digitized by Microsoft®

will shortly have mercy upon us, and gather us together out of every land under heaven into the holy place: for he hath delivered us out of great troubles, and hath purified the place.

19 Now as concerning Judas Maccabeus, and his brethren, and the purification of the great temple, and the dedication of the altar,

20 And the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes, and Eupator his son,

21 And [m] the manifest signs that came from heaven unto those that behaved themselves manfully to their honour for Judaism: so that, being but a few, they overcame the whole country, and chased barbarous multitudes,

22 And recovered again the temple renowned all the world over, and

[m] ch. 3. 24 & 5. 2. & 10. 29. & 11. 8. & 15. 12

reference is probably to such passages as Deut. iv. 29–31, xxx. 3–10, where full restoration to God's favour is promised upon a national repentance.

into the holy place.] Compare ch. i. 29. The "holy place" is Judæa, which Judas is viewed as having cleansed and purified at the same time with the Temple.

§ 3. The Author's Account of the Source, and Plan, of the Remainder of the Work.

19–32. This "prologue" or "preface," as it is generally called by commentators, comprises: 1. An enumeration of the main contents (vv. 19–22); 2. A statement of the source from which they are taken (v. 23); and 3. A declaration of the objects had in view by the writer, and the plan pursued by him in the arrangement of his work (vv. 24–32). By the way, he notes that his task has been no easy one, but has involved much labour and trouble (vv. 26, 27).

19. as concerning Judas Maccabeus.] In the preceding letter, the Jewish leader has been "Judas" simply; now he is "Judas Maccabeus," or more literally "Judas the Maccabean." So also in ch. v. 27, and viii. 1. In the remainder of the Book he is "the Maccabean" or "Judas" indifferently. On the origin of the name, see the comment on 1 Macc. ii. 4.

and his brethren.] Unlike the author of the First Book, the writer assumes a general knowledge of the history on the part of his readers. He gives no formal list of the brothers, corresponding to that in 1 Macc. ii. 2–5, but introduces them casually, when they have to play a part in the history, as well-known personages (ch. x. 22, 23).

the purification of the great temple.] See ch. x. 5–7. The epithet "great" is omitted by most of the MSS., and is scarcely appropriate to the Temple, which was a small building. Elsewhere the writer calls the Temple "renowned" (v. 22), "holy" or "hallowed" (ch. xv. 18), and "most holy" (ch. v. 15), but not "great." Μεγίστου (ch. xiv. 13 and 31) means "most noble," not "greatest."

the dedication of the altar.] See ch. x. 3, and compare 1 Macc. iv. 47, 53.

20. the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes and Eupator.] The former are contained in chs. viii. and ix.; the latter in chs. x.–xiii. Chs. xiv. and xv. treat of the war between Judas and Demetrius Soter.

21. the manifest signs that came from heaven.] These "manifest signs" (ἐπιφάνειαι) are a marked characteristic of 2 Macc., and have been said to "form the staple of the Book." (Westcott in Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 178.) The most remarkable will be found in ch. iii. 24–29, 33, 34; v. 2–4; x. 29, 30; xi. 6–11; xii. 22.

for Judaism.] "Judaism" means here, and in ch. viii. 1, the Jewish religion. It is antithetical to Ἑλληνισμός ("the Greek religion") and ἀλλοφυλισμός ("the Gentile religion"). The word occurs in the same sense in Gal. i. 13; Ignat. 'Ep. ad Magnes.' § 10; Justin. Mart. 'Resp. ad Orthodox.' p. 2, and elsewhere. It belongs in this sense only to the later Hellenistic Greek.

they overcame the whole country.] Rather, "they plundered the whole country." The writer refers in part to those expeditions which Judas made from time to time against the Hellenising Jews, to punish them for their ungodly conduct (1 Macc. iii. 5, 8; vii. 24), in part to those which he conducted against the heathen who possessed much of the land (1 Macc. v. 21–51).

and chased barbarous multitudes.] See below, ch. viii. 6, 24; x. 32; xi. 11; xii. 22, &c. The author retorts on the Greeks the epithet of "barbarous," habitually applied by them to all nations but their own.

22. the temple renowned all the world over.] Compare ch. iii. 12. Philo calls it τὸν περισημότατον καὶ ἐπιφανέστατον νεών ('Leg. ad Cai.' § 29). It does not appear to have really attracted very much attention on the freed the city, and upheld the laws which were going down, the Lord being gracious unto them with all favour:

Digitized by Microsoft®

23 All these things, I say, being declared by Jason of Cyrene in five books, we will assay to abridge in one volume.

24 For considering the infinite number, and the difficulty which they find that desire to look into the narrations of the story, for the variety of the matter,

25 We have been careful, that they that will read may have delight, and that they that are desirous to commit to memory might have ease, and that all into whose hands it comes might have profit.

26 Therefore to us, that have taken upon us this painful labour of abridging, it was not easy, but a matter of sweat and watching;

27 Even as it is no ease unto him that prepareth a banquet, and seeketh the benefit of others: yet ‖for the pleasuring of many we will undertake gladly this great pains;

‖ Or, to deserve well of many.

28 Leaving to the author the exact handling of every particular, and labouring to follow the rules of an abridgement.

part of the heathen nations, at any rate until its rebuilding by Herod the Great. The dimensions were small (Ezra vi. 3), and the ornamentation not very rich (Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 113).

freed the city.] Compare ch. x. 1. Some portion of the city was no doubt situated on the Temple hill, and passed into the hands of Judas with the Temple itself. But the "city of David," as it was called (1 Macc. i. 33) on the western hill, being commanded by the Acra, remained in the possession of the Syrians until it was taken by Simon (ib. xiii. 49–51; xiv. 36).

the laws which were going down.] Rather, "which were about to be abolished" (1 Macc. i. 42–52; 2 Macc. vi. 1–9). If Epiphanes had been allowed to have his way, the observance of the Mosaic Law would have wholly ceased.

23. these things . . . being declared by Jason of Cyrene.] Jason of Cyrene is not otherwise known to us. He has been thought to be the same with the "Jason, son of Eleazar," mentioned in 1 Macc. viii. 17; but it is not at all probable that that Jason was a Cyrenæan. Cyrene under the Ptolemies belonged to Egypt, and the Cyrenæan Jews were a sort of offset from those of Alexandria, with whom they had constant intercourse. Professor Westcott regards the work of Jason as written at Alexandria ('Dict. of the Bible,' vol. ii. p. 175).

in five books.] The "five books" of Jason's work are thought to have corresponded to five marked divisions in the epitomator's narrative —the first at the end of ch. iii., the next at the close of ch. vii., the third between vv. 9 and 10 of ch. x., the fourth at the close of ch. xiii., and the fifth at the end of the first clause of v. 37 in ch. xv.

24. considering the infinite number.] Rather, "considering the multiplicity of the numbers." The writer alludes to the numerous dates, estimates of the numbers of armies, of the slain, and of prisoners taken, which are to be found in ordinary histories. These he regards as dull and uninteresting, and considers it to be the epitomator's duty to eliminate.

that desire to look into the narrations of the story.] Rather, "that desire to employ themselves in historical narratives." for the variety of the matter.] Rather, "the superabundance of the matter."

25. We have been careful.] Or, "it has been our aim." Three things have been specially considered—1. The gratification of the ordinary reader; 2. The ease and convenience of those who might wish not merely to read, but to commit to memory; and 3. The general benefit of all into whose hands the book might come. The rarity and high price of manuscripts caused the practice of committing whole treatises to memory to be common in the ancient world.

26. Therefore.] Rather, "And truly" (καὶ μέν).

a matter of . . . watching.] Literally, "of sleeplessness"—i.e. of sitting up at night.

27. him that prepareth a banquet.] The ἀρχιτρίκλινος or "governor of a feast," who had the preparation and direction of it, but was not the giver. (See John ii. 10; Ecclus. xxxii. 1, 2.)

28. Leaving to the author.] Rather, "to the historian." It is the part of a historian to give all the facts (ἕκαστα), and to set them forth with completeness and accuracy. An abbreviator must leave out many particulars, and be content, even with respect to such as he selects, to set them forth less fully and exactly.

Digitized by Microsoft®

29 For as the master builder of a new house must care for the whole building: but he that undertaketh to set it out, and paint it, must seek out fit things for the adorning thereof: even so I think it is with us.

30 To stand upon every point, and go over things at large, and to be curious in particulars, belongeth to the first author of the story:

31 But to use brevity, and avoid much labouring of the work, is to be granted to him that will make an abridgement.

32 Here then will we begin the story: only adding thus much to that which hath been said, that it is a foolish thing to make a long prologue, and to be short in the story itself.

CHAPTER III.

1 Of the honour done to the temple by the kings of the Gentiles. 4 Simon uttereth what treasures are in the temple. 7 Heliodorus is sent to take them away. 24 He is stricken of God, and healed at the prayer of Onias.

NOW when the holy city was inhabited with all peace, and cir. 187

29. the whole building.] Literally, "the whole ground-plan;" but the writer probably intended to use the word in a wide sense.

he that undertaketh to set it out.] Rather, "to adorn it by means of encaustic." The writer seems here to claim, as within his province, the right of working up the materials which he takes from Jason, of beautifying and adorning them. Encaustic was used by the Babylonians, Assyrians, Greeks, and Romans in the ornamentation of their houses. The exposed surface of bricks or tiles was covered with a glaze, on which patterns or figures were painted, and the painting was then fixed by being subjected to the heat of a furnace. The colours were thus "burnt in."

so I think it is with us.] This combination of the first person singular with the first person plural is curious. It looks like an accident. Elsewhere, through the whole of the preface, the first person plural only is used. At the close of the work, however (ch. xv. 37, 38), the first person singular recurs.

30. To stand upon every point.] Rather, "to go into matters," or "insist upon them."

and go over things at large.] Or "treat of all points."

and to be curious.] Or "elaborate."

31. to use brevity.] Literally, "to aim at brevity of expression." Our author sometimes, though but seldom, does this. (See ch. xiii. 18–26.) For the most part, he is wordy and elaborate, as in this quite unnecessarily long preface. He evidently wishes to be regarded as "a fine writer."

and avoid.] Literally, "beg off" or "excuse oneself from."

much labouring of the work.] Rather, "much elaboration of the history." The author seems to regard it as the epitomator's task to take his facts from his author and add nothing to them, but to set them forth with all the rhetorical artifices of which he is master. (See v. 29.)

32. will we begin.] Literally, "let us begin."

only adding.] Rather, "having only added."

thus much.] Verses 19–31.

that it is.] Rather, "for it is." This is not the "addition" spoken of, but the reason for not adding anything more.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE JEWS FROM B.C. 180 TO B.C. 161.

PART I.

§ 1. THE ATTEMPT OF HELIODORUS TO PLUNDER THE TEMPLE TREASURY, AND ITS FRUSTRATION.

1–3. To increase the horror of his narrative by the force of contrast, the writer opens this section of his work with a brief but graphic picture of the deep peace which the proceedings of Heliodorus, and of those who incited him, disturbed. A good and pious king, Seleucus IV., held the Syrian crown, and shewed favour to the Jews, even going so far as to furnish from his own revenue the entire cost of the Temple sacrifices (v. 3). An excellent High Priest, Onias III., presided over the Temple services (v. 1). The people generally were zealous observers of the Law; and if any had the desire to cast aside its shackles, they were restrained by their fear of Onias, who was a stern repressor of all attempts to escape from legal obligations (ibid.).

1. the holy city.] I.e. Jerusalem. (See ch. i. 12; and compare Is. xlviii. 2, lxiv. 9; Dan. ix. 24; Neh. xi. 1, 18.)

with all peace.] Neither danger nor disturbance threatening, either from without or

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 187. the laws were kept very well, because of the godliness of Onias the high priest, and his hatred of wickedness,

2 It came to pass that even the kings themselves did honour the place, and magnify the temple with their best gifts;

3 Insomuch that Seleucus king of Asia of his own revenues bare all the costs belonging to the service of the sacrifices. B. C. cir. 187.

4 But one Simon of the tribe of Benjamin, who was made governor of the temple, fell out with the high priest about disorder in the city.

5 And when he could not overcome Onias, he gat him to Apollonius the son of Thraseas, who then was governor of Celosyria and Phenice, from within. Internal peace is specially intended.

and the laws were kept very well.] Rather, "while the laws were still observed most excellently." There is an allusion to the subsequent coming of a time when the Mosaic law was transgressed and forsaken, and strange laws set up and followed. (See 1 Macc. i. 15, 42–49.)

Onias the high priest.] The "Onias" intended was the third of the name. He was the son and successor of Simon II., and the grandson of Onias II. He held the office of High Priest from B.C. 198 to B.C. 175. On the excellency of his character, see ch. iv. 2 and xv. 12.

2. the kings themselves.] I.e. the Syrian monarchs, Antiochus the Great, and his son, the Seleucus of v. 3.

did . . . magnify the temple with their best gifts.] As the Ptolemies had done before them. (See Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 2, § 5; 'Contr. Ap.' ii. 5.)

3. Seleucus king of Asia.] Seleucus IV. (Philopator) was the son of Antiochus the Great, and succeeded him on the throne in B.C. 187. He was a weak prince, and reigned only eleven years, from B.C. 187 to B.C. 176. It is within this space that the events recorded in the present chapter must be placed. On the title "king of Asia," see the comment upon 1 Macc. viii. 6.

bare all the costs belonging to the service of the sacrifices.] This was the customary form which royal bounty took, when it was extended to a temple. Darius Hystaspis assigned revenues for the purpose of furnishing the Jewish sacrifices in B.C. 519 (Ezra vi. 9), and Artaxerxes Mnemon in B.C. 457 (ib. vii. 20–23). Demetrius I. offered to do the same in B.C. 152 (1 Macc. x. 39).

4–7. The circumstances which led to the attempt of Heliodorus are now related with extreme brevity: "One Simon, of the tribe of Benjamin," who held the office of governor of the Temple, quarrelled with Onias, the High Priest, on the subject of certain infractions of the Law which were going on in Jerusalem, which Simon desired to shield and Onias to punish. As Onias would not yield, Simon, in revenge, suggested to Apollonius, governor of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia, the advantage that it would be to the king to seize the Temple treasures. Apollonius communicated the suggestion to Seleucus, with the result that Heliodorus was selected to effect the seizure.

4. governor of the temple.] The exact nature of this office is uncertain. Ewald says that Simon, "under the honourable designation of overseer, was charged with providing the various supplies for the Temple, and hence had great influence on the prices of corn and other necessaries of life in Jerusalem." ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 292.) Others suppose him to have been the Temple treasurer (γαζοφύλαξ, Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xx. 8, § 11), or the "captain of the Temple" (Acts iv. 1, v. 24); but this last-named office did not exist till Roman times. Possibly, as Calmet thinks, he was the surveyor who had charge of the Temple buildings.

fell out with the high priest about disorder.] Rather, "about transgressions of the Law" (παρανομία). The Hellenising spirit was just beginning to shew itself, and the opposition between the Hellenists and the Chasidim or "pious" to break forth. Onias, naturally, was on the side of the latter; Simon undertook the patronage of the former.

5. Apollonius the son of Thraseas.] Rather, "the son of Thrasæus." It has been proposed to identify this person either with the Apollonius of 1 Macc. iii. 10–12, Judas Maccabeus' first antagonist, who was commandant of Samaria about nine years later, according to Josephus ('A. J.' xii. 7, § 1), or with the Apollonius of Polybius (xxxi. 21, § 2), who is said to have had great influence with Seleucus IV., and who after the accession of Epiphanes betook himself to Miletus (Grimm). But there are no sufficient grounds for either identification.

governor of Celosyria and Phenice.] "Celosyria" is a wrong form, and should be corrected into "Cœlesyria," wherever it is found. Ἡ κοίλη Συρία was (strictly speaking)

B. C. cir. 187.

6 And told him that the treasury in Jerusalem was full of infinite sums of money, so that the multitude of their riches, which did not pertain to the account of the sacrifices, was innumerable, and that it was possible to bring all into the king's hand.

7 Now when Apollonius came to the king, and had shewed him of the money whereof he was told, the king chose out Heliodorus his treasurer, and sent him with a commandment to bring him the foresaid money.

8 So forthwith Heliodorus took his journey, under a colour of visiting the cities of Celosyria and Phenice, but indeed to fulfil the king's purpose.

B. C. cir. 187.

9 And when he was come to Jerusalem, and had been courteously received of the high priest of the city, he told him what intelligence was given of the money, and declared wherefore he came, and asked if these things were so indeed.

10 Then the high priest told him that there was such money laid up for the relief of widows and fatherless children:

11 And that some of it belonged to Hircanus son of Tobias, a man of the deep valley between Libanus and Antilibanus, which formed the bulk of the Syrian territory. The term was used, however, more generally, of the whole of Southern Syria.

6. the treasury in Jerusalem.] The Temple treasury seems to have grown up out of the "chambers for the treasures" (Neh. xii. 44), in which were stored the tithes and offerings of the faithful (2 Chr. xxxi. 11, 12; Neh. xiii. 5, 12, 13), which were chiefly paid in kind. As time went on, the gifts of princes and of private individuals, in gold and silver vessels and in specie, were added to the other deposits; and ultimately private individuals, such as widows and orphans, or even wealthy men, who wanted to put their money in a sure place, were allowed to lay it up in the Temple treasury, as in a bank, from which they could draw it in their need. It was thus especially that the vast quantity of wealth in the treasury of the Temple at Jerusalem had been accumulated, and that it had reached an amount which naturally attracted the cupidity of public personages.

full of infinite sums of money.] Literally, "of untold sums."

which did not pertain, &c.] I.e. "besides what had reference to the Temple service, the support of the priests, and other similar objects."

was innumerable.] The reading of most MSS. is the opposite of this—"was numerable;" but it is absolutely necessary to make the correction (of ἐναρίθμητον into ἀναρίθμητον) which produces the sense given by our translators. The Alexandrian and nine other MSS. have the true reading.

it was possible to bring all into the king's hand.] Literally, "it was possible that all this should fall into the king's power."

7. Heliodorus his treasurer.] Rather, "his chief minister" (τὸν ἐπὶ τῶν πραγμάτων). Heliodorus is mentioned as one of the courtiers of Seleucus by Appian ('Syriac.' § 45). He ultimately murdered his master, and seized the throne, which he occupied for a short space.

8–22. Heliodorus at first clokes his design, but, in a conference with the High Priest, reveals it and appoints a day for carrying it out. The grief and horror of all classes, and their appeals to God to prevent the sacrilege, are graphically described.

8. under a colour, &c.] If Heliodorus had avowed the object of his journey, the news might have preceded his arrival at Jerusalem, and the treasures might have been removed and concealed.

9. what intelligence was given of the money.] I.e. what information concerning it had been given by Simon to Apollonius (supra, v. 6).

10. Then the high priest told him.] Rather, "shewed him."

that there was such money laid up for the relief of widows, &c.] Literally, "that the money consisted of the deposits of widows and orphans." It had been laid up in the Temple treasury for better security by them or their guardians. In the absence of secular banks of deposit, temples were not unfrequently made a substitute for them in ancient times. Of course, no interest was allowed; but the depositors were entitled to withdraw their deposits at any moment.

11. Hircanus son of Tobias.] Rather, "Hyrcanus." Josephus makes Hyrcanus the grandson of Tobias, and the son of a certain Joseph, who grew rich by farming the revenues of Palestine under the Egyptian great dignity, and not as that wicked Simon had misinformed: the sum whereof in all was four hundred talents of silver, and two hundred of gold:

Digitized by Microsoft®

12 And that it was altogether impossible that such wrongs should be done unto them, that had committed it to the holiness of the place, and to the majesty and inviolable sanctity of the temple, honoured over all the world.

13 But Heliodorus, because of the king's commandment given him, said, That in any wise it must be brought into the king's treasury.

14 So at the day which he appointed he entered in to order this matter: wherefore there was no small agony throughout the whole city.

15 But the priests, prostrating themselves before the altar in their priests' vestments, called unto heaven upon him that [a] made a law concerning things given to be kept, that they should safely be preserved for government. Joseph's mother was a sister of Onias II., the High Priest. Hyrcanus was his father's favourite son, and became his representative at the Egyptian court, where he ingratiated himself with the monarch, and was made, like his father, a collector of the revenue. The jealousy of his brothers, who were at open feud with him, forced him after a time to withdraw himself into the country east of the Jordan, where he built himself a castle near Heshbon, and amassed considerable wealth, partly by collecting the taxes, partly by plundering the wild Arabs of the vicinity. Ultimately, in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, fearing that he would be attacked and punished for his irregular proceedings, he committed suicide. (Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 4, § 2–11.) His name is thought to remain in the modern Arak-el-Emir, the present appellation of the castle where he spent the latter portion of his life. (Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 247.)

[a] Exod. 22. 7, &c.

not as that wicked Simon had misinformed.] Simon had represented the whole as public money, whereas the greater part, or at any rate a great part, was private; belonging either to Hyrcanus, or to the widows and orphans.

the sum . . . four hundred talents of silver, and two hundred of gold.] Four hundred silver talents would be equal to about 96,000*l.* of our money. Two hundred gold talents, taking gold at fifteen times the value of silver, would be equal to 720,000*l.* Thus the total value would be about 816,000*l.* When Pompey entered the Temple, the treasury contained no more than 2000 silver talents, worth 480,000*l.* (See Joseph. 'A. J.' xiv. 4, § 4.)

12. it was altogether impossible.] I.e. it was so monstrous an iniquity as to seem to him morally impossible.

that had committed it.] Rather, "that had trusted."

the temple honoured over all the world.] See the comment on ch. ii. 22.

14. at the day . . . appointed he entered in.] Rather, "he was about to enter in." The imperfect tense is used here, and again in verse 23, in the sense from which it derives its name, of an act contemplated but not accomplished. (Compare Herod. i. 68: Ἐμισθοῦτο παρ' οὐκ ἐκδιδόντος τὴν αὐλήν.)

there was no small agony throughout the whole city.] Dean Stanley calls the description which follows "a complete representation of what must have been the general aspect of a panic in Jerusalem" ('Lectures,' vol. iii. p. 287). "The priests," he continues, "in their official costume are prostrate before the altar. The High Priest is in such 'an inward agony of mind that whoso had looked at his countenance and changing colour, it would have wounded his heart.' The Temple courts are crowded with supplicants; the matrons, with bare bosoms, running franctically through the streets; the maidens, unable to break their seclusion, yet peering over walls, and through windows, and at every door to catch the news; the pitiless officer bent on discharging his mission."

15. before the altar.] Probably, the altar of burnt offering in the court directly in front of the Temple, where they would be conspicuous to all.

in their priests' vestments.] See Ex. xxviii. 40. Vestments of fine white linen, with embroidered girdles, and white linen caps or turbans upon their heads.

called unto heaven.] Compare 1 Macc. iii. 50; ix. 46.

that they should be safely preserved.] Rather, "that he would safely preserve them." The clause expresses the matter of the priests' prayer, not the object of the law which God had given.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 187.

such as had committed them to be kept.

16 Then whoso had looked the high priest in the face, it would have wounded his heart: for his countenance and the changing of his colour declared the inward agony of his mind.

17 For the man was so compassed with fear and horror of the body, that it was manifest to them that looked upon him, what sorrow he had now in his heart.

18 Others ran flocking out of their houses ‖ to the general supplication, because the place was like to come into contempt.

‖ Or, to make general supplication.

19 And the women, girt with sackcloth under their breasts, abounded in the streets, and the virgins that were kept in ran, some to the gates, and some to the walls, and others looked out of the windows.

B. C. cir. 187.

20 And all, holding their hands toward heaven, made supplication.

21 Then it would have pitied a man to see the falling down of the multitude of all sorts, and the ‖ fear of the high priest, being in such an agony.

‖ Gr. expectation.

22 They then called upon the Almighty Lord to keep the things committed of trust safe and sure for those that had committed them.

23 Nevertheless Heliodorus executed that which was decreed.

24 Now as he was there present himself with his guard about the

18. Others ran flocking . . . to the general supplication.] Rather, "to a general supplication." It is not implied that any order had been issued for the people to assemble; rather, there was a general instinctive rush of all classes from their houses to the Temple for the purpose of supplicating God. By the universality of the instinct, the supplication became a "general" one.

the place.] I.e. "the temple." Compare v. 2.

19. the women (i.e. the married women) girt with sackcloth under their breasts.] I.e. with breasts bare, and clad below the breast with a robe or gown of sackcloth. (Compare 1 Macc. ii. 14; iii. 47.)

the virgins that were kept in.] Compare 3 Macc. i. 18. The old freedom had been laid aside, and the Jewish maidens, reduced to the general Asiatic level, were kept within doors, and, as much as possible, in the female apartments. (See Philo, 'De spec. Leg.,' § 31.)

to the gates.] I.e. the doors of their respective mansions.

the walls.] Scarcely the town walls. Rather, the walls of gardens; or, perhaps, the parapets round the roofs of houses.

the windows.] See Judg. v. 28; 2 Sam. vi. 16; 2 Kings ix. 30. Windows, guarded by a lattice, often gave upon the street, and furnished convenient posts of observation for those who wished to see without being seen.

21. the falling down of the multitude.] I.e. their prostration in prayer.

the fear of the high priest.] Rather, "the suspense," or "strained expectation."

22. They . . . called upon the Almighty Lord.] Most of the MSS. and versions have "the Almighty God." With the prayer itself, compare v. 15.

23–34. The sounds and sights which surrounded him did not deter Heliodorus from his purpose. Epiphanes had laid his commands upon him to bring the money into his treasury (vv. 7, 13); and it would have been incurring a great risk to disobey his orders. Heliodorus therefore proceeded to accomplish his task. But, according to our author, at this point opposition manifested itself. A warrior in golden armour, mounted upon a fierce horse, suddenly appeared within the Temple precinct bearing down upon the Syrian minister; the horse struck at him with his fore feet, while two footmen, standing one on either side of him, scourged the rash intruder with many stripes. Heliodorus fell to the ground dazed and powerless, and was borne off in a litter, after the High Priest had offered sacrifice for him, and entreated God to spare his life. The writer regards the whole scene as miraculous; but he admits that there were some who traced in it the contriving hand of Onias, and believed the ghostly warriors to have been ordinary men, who, at the instigation of the High Priest, had terrified and chastised the king's emissary (ch. iv. 1).

23. Heliodorus executed.] Rather, "proceeded to carry out." (See the comment on v. 14.)

24. with his guard.] That he had come with a considerable armed force, in case he should meet with resistance, is apparent also from vv. 28 and 35.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 187.

treasury, the ‖Lord of spirits, and the Prince of all power, caused a great apparition, so that all that presumed to come in with him were astonished at the power of God, and fainted, and were sore afraid.

‖ Or, Lord of our fathers.

25 For there appeared unto them an horse with a terrible rider upon him, and adorned with a very fair covering, and he ran fiercely, and smote at Heliodorus with his forefeet, and it seemed that he that sat upon the horse had complete harness of gold.

26 Moreover two other young men appeared before him, notable in strength, excellent in beauty, and comely in apparel, who stood by him on either side, and scourged him continually, and gave him many sore stripes.

27 And Heliodorus fell suddenly unto the ground, and was compassed with great darkness: but they that were with him took him up, and put him into a litter.

B. C. cir. 187.

28 Thus him, that lately came with a great train and with all his guard into the said treasury, they carried out, being unable to help himself with his weapons: and manifestly they acknowledged the power of God:

29 For he by the hand of God was cast down, and lay speechless without all hope of life.

30 But they praised the Lord, that had miraculously honoured his own place: for the temple, which a little afore was full of fear and trouble, when the Almighty Lord appeared, was filled with joy and gladness.

about the treasury.] Rather, "at the treasury"—probably at the door, about to enter.

the Lord of spirits.] So the Alexandrian Septuagint, the Syriac, and several MSS.; but the Vatican Codex and the MSS. generally have "the Lord of our fathers." The ordinary expression is "the Lord God of our fathers" (Ex. ii. 13, 15, 16; iv. 5;—Deut. i. 11; iv. 1; xii. 1, &c.).

caused a great apparition.] On the fondness of the author for "apparitions" see the comment on ch. ii. 21.

that presumed.] Rather, "that had presumed."

25. he . . . smote at Heliodorus with his fore feet.] Herodotus tells of a horse which was trained, on approaching an enemy, to rear up and attack him with his fore feet and teeth (v. 111). The owner of the animal was a Persian.

he that sat upon the horse had complete harness of gold.] So the angelic horseman in ch. xi. 8. Those in ch. x. 29 have "golden bridles." Masistius, the commander of the Persian cavalry at the battle of Platæa, wore a cuirass which was made of golden scales (Herod. ix. 22).

26. two other young men appeared before him.] I.e. "were seen in front of the rider."

27. Heliodorus fell suddenly unto the ground.] It is not said that he was cast on the ground by the horseman, much less that he was "trampled under foot" (Stanley); but rather that he fell fainting under the blows of the scourgers, and lost consciousness.

put him into a litter.] Litters were used by the Egyptians from a very early date, and are represented in the painted ornamentation of the tombs (Rosellini, 'Mon. Civili,' pl. xciii. 2). They were slung on poles, and carried on the shoulders of slaves. From the Egyptians they passed to their Persian conquerors, who used them even in their warlike expeditions (Herod. vii. 41).

28. with a great train.] Rather, "with many horsemen."

unable to help himself with his weapons.] There is no mention of "weapons." The statement is that he was "quite unable to help himself,"—"altogether helpless," as we should now say.

manifestly they acknowledged the power of God.] His bearers, some of his own heathen attendants, were so impressed by what they had seen that they openly acknowledged what had been done to have been effected by the power of God.

29. by the hand of God.] Rather, "by the might of God."

30. when the Almighty Lord appeared.] It is not meant to identify the angelic apparition of v. 25 with God himself, as some have supposed. Any surprising occurrence was regarded by the later Jews as a Divine manifestation (ἐπιφάνεια) or revelation of the presence of God—even a timely and unexpected shower of rain. (See Joseph. 'A. J.' xviii. 8, § 6: Ὁ θεὸς παρουσίαν ἐδείκνυε

B. C. cir. 187.

31 Then straightways certain of Heliodorus' friends prayed Onias, that he would call upon the most High to grant him his life, who lay ready to give up the ghost.

32 So the high priest, suspecting lest the king should misconceive that some treachery had been done to Heliodorus by the Jews, offered a sacrifice for the health of the man.

33 Now as the high priest was making an atonement, the same young men in the same clothing appeared and stood beside Heliodorus, saying, Give Onias the high priest great thanks, insomuch as for his sake the Lord hath granted thee life:

B. C. cir. 187.

34 And seeing that thou hast been scourged from heaven, declare unto all men the mighty power of God. And when they had spoken these words, they appeared no more.

35 So Heliodorus, after he had τὴν αὐτοῦ Πετρωνίῳ . . . ὁ Πετρώνιος δὲ κατεπέπληκτο, ὁρῶν ἐναργῶς τὸν θεὸν . . . πολλὴν ἀποσημήναντα τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν.)

31. the most High.] The heathen could recognise Jehovah as "the most High," either identifying Him with their own chief Deity—Bel, or Merodach, or Ormazd, or Zeus, as the case might be—or regarding Him as the "god of the land," and so as "most High" within His own jurisdiction. Nebuchadnezzar had given the title to the god of the Jews more than once (Dan. iii. 26; iv. 2, 34); Darius the Mede had called Him "the living God" (ib. vi. 20, 26); Cyrus, "the God" (ha-elohim); Darius Hystaspis, "the God of heaven" (Ezra vi. 9, 10); Artaxerxes, the same (ib. vii. 21, 23). Acknowledgments of this kind involved no change of religion, and were readily enough made, when there was anything to gain by making them.

to grant him his life.] Rather, "and thus give life to him who," &c. Onias is viewed as giving the life which he prays God to spare.

who lay ready to give up the ghost.] Literally, "who lay at the last gasp."

32. suspecting lest the king should misconceive that some treachery had been done to Heliodorus.] This is probably the true explanation of the whole occurrence recorded. As it was certainly not in the designs of Providence to preserve the Temple treasures from the cupidity of the Syrian kings (1 Macc. i. 21–23), we cannot, with the author of the Book, suppose a real miracle to have been wrought. Neither can we imagine the story to have taken the full and substantial shape which it wears in this chapter without some solid foundation. Heliodorus must have made the attempt recorded; and Heliodorus must have been baffled. The question is, what baffled him? Probably, arrangements made, with the connivance of the High Priest, to impose upon his credulity by appearances which he might think supernatural, and before which he might therefore yield. Compare the arrangements by which the Delphian priests succeeded in preserving the treasures of their temple from Xerxes in B.C. 480 (Herod. viii. 37–39), and again from the Gauls in B.C. 279 (Pausan. x. 23). Onias might well fear lest the true nature of the obstacles to which Heliodorus yielded should become known.

33. as the high priest was making an atonement.] Rather, "the propitiation" (τὸν ἱλασμόν)—i.e. as he was offering the sacrifice which was to expiate Heliodorus's crime.

appeared.] Rather, "appeared a second time" (πάλιν).

34. seeing that thou hast been scourged from heaven.] The Vatican and several other MSS. have ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, "by him," instead of ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, "from heaven;" while the Syrian and Vulgate versions have "by God." Ὑπ' αὐτοῦ is probably the true reading, God being intended, not however as the actual scourger, but as the originator of the punishment, which angel hands carried out. (See the comment on v. 30.)

they appeared no more.] Rather, "they disappeared from sight." These later details are most probably embellishments—perhaps "encaustics" of the epitomator (ch. ii. 29).

35–40. Sequel of the story. Heliodorus, having offered sacrifice and given thanks to God, returns to Antioch, and declares to all what has happened to him. On being asked by Seleucus what sort of person he would recommend to be sent to Jerusalem on an errand similar to his own, he advises the king to select an enemy or a traitor (v. 38), since whoever goes will be sure to suffer pretty severely, even if he escape with his life.

35. Heliodorus, after he had offered sacrifice.] It was open to any one, whether Jew or heathen, to offer sacrifice in the Jewish temple. The offerer brought the sacrifice and laid his hand on its head, thus identifying

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 187. offered sacrifice unto the Lord, and made great vows unto him that had saved his life, and saluted Onias, returned with his host to the king.

36 Then testified he to all men the works of the great God, which he had seen with his eyes.

37 And when the king asked Heliodorus, who might be a fit man to be sent yet once again to Jerusalem, he said, 38 If thou hast any enemy or traitor, send him thither, and thou shalt receive him well scourged, if he escape with his life: for in that place, no doubt, there is an especial power of God.

39 For he that dwelleth in heaven hath his eye on that place, and defendeth it; and he beateth and destroyeth them that come to hurt it. B. C. cir. 187.

40 And the things concerning Heliodorus, and the keeping of the treasury, fell out on this sort.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Simon slandereth Onias. 7 Jason, by corrupting the king, obtaineth the office of the high priest. 24 Menelaus getteth the same from Jason by the like corruption. 34 Andronicus traitorously murdereth Onias. 36 The king being informed thereof, causeth Andronicus to be put to death. 39 The wickedness of Lysimachus, by the instigation of Menelaus.

THIS Simon now, [a]of whom we spake afore, having been a bewrayer of the money, and of his country, slandered Onias, as if he had terrified Heliodorus, and been the worker of these evils. cir. 187. [a] ch. 3. 4.

himself with his offering. Originally he slew it (Lev. i. 5, 11; iii. 2, 8, 24, &c.); but ultimately the Levites undertook that office (2 Chr. xxx. 17; xxxv. 6). The blood was then taken by the priests and poured upon the altar. Either the whole victim, or certain parts of it, were also burnt by the priests upon the altar. Thus both the layman and the priest might be said, in different senses, to "offer" the sacrifice.

made great vows.] The words εὔχεσθαι and εὐχαί are used indifferently of prayer, praise, vows proper, and thanksgiving. Here the offering of praise and thanksgiving would seem to be intended.

saluted Onias.] Rather, "held friendly converse with Onias." Compare ch. xiii. 24.

with his host.] See the comment on v. 24.

36. the works . . . which he had seen with his eyes.] Heliodorus did not consider that he had had a vision. The beings whom he regarded as supernatural had yet been seen by his natural eyes.

37. who might be a fit man.] Rather, "what sort of a man would be a fitting one to send." Seleucus did not ask him to designate the individual.

38. traitor.] Literally, "plotter against thy government." This was what Heliodorus himself became soon afterwards (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 46).

if he escape.] Rather, "even if he escape" (ἐάν περ καί).

40. the keeping of the treasury.] I.e. the watch and ward kept over the Temple treasury by angelic beings, which the story illustrates.

CHAPTER IV.

PART II.

§ 1. Further Troubles caused by Simon in Jerusalem.

1-6. On the return of Heliodorus to Antioch empty-handed, Simon was not slow to suggest that Onias had been at the bottom of the pretended miracles by which Heliodorus had allowed himself to be terrified. Onias was, he said, a "plotter against the government," and ought to be punished as such. At the same time his faction committed murders in Jerusalem, and he was known to be upheld in his opposition to Onias by the Apollonius to whom he had applied in the first instance (ch. iii. 5), the governor of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia. Under these circumstances the High Priest felt it incumbent on him to proceed to the Court, to defend his own conduct and induce Seleucus to put a stop to Simon's insolence.

1. a bewrayer of the money and of his country.] See ch. iii. 4–7. In betraying the secret of the richness of the Temple treasury, he had been a betrayer of the interests of his country.

slandered Onias.] Literally, "spake evil of Onias."

as if he had terrified Heliodorus.] Rather, "that it was he who had terrified Heliodorus." (See the comment on ch. iii. 32.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 187.

2 Thus was he bold to call him a traitor, that had deserved well of the city, and tendered his own nation, and was so zealous of the laws.

3 But when their hatred went so far, that by one of Simon's faction murders were committed,

4 Onias seeing the danger of this contention, and that Apollonius, as being the governor of Celosyria and Phenice, did rage, and increase Simon's malice,

5 He went to the king, not to be an accuser of his countrymen, but seeking the good of all, both publick and private: B. C. cir. 187

6 For he saw that it was impossible that the state should continue quiet, and Simon leave his folly, unless the king did look thereunto.

7 But after the death of Seleucus, when Antiochus, called Epiphanes, took the kingdom, Jason the bro- B. C. 176.

The accusation, no doubt, was that Onias had contrived the whole business.

2. Thus was he bold to call him a traitor.] Literally, "a plotter against the government." The words are the same as those used by Heliodorus in ch. iii. 38.

zealous of the laws.] Compare ch. iii. 4, 5. Onias was the head of the orthodox, Simon of the Hellenizing party. The antagonism which broke out openly soon afterwards (vv. 7–17) was already shewing itself. (See the comment on ch. iii. 4.)

3. their hatred.] I.e. the feud between Onias and Simon.

4. Apollonius.] Compare ch. iii. 5.

did rage.] Apollonius was as angry as Simon that the attempt to seize the Temple treasures had failed. He had probably looked to rise high in the favour of the king by being instrumental in obtaining him such a windfall. The failure of Heliodorus had disappointed this hope.

5. not to be an accuser of his countrymen.] Compare Acts xxviii. 19: "Not that I had aught to accuse my nation of." No act could be worse in the eyes of Jews than that one of their own number should lay a complaint against his nation before a heathen tribunal. The author, who is very jealous of the honour of Onias (ch. iii. 1; iv. 2, &c.), wishes to clear him of any such charge. It was not his nation, but a few individuals of his nation, that he accused, and this he did only because it was required for the general good of the whole community.

both publick and private.] Or, "both collectively and individually."

6. unless the king did look thereunto.] It does not appear that Seleucus took any active steps in consequence of the visit of Onias. Perhaps he might have done so had it not been for his untimely death. Or perhaps he may have sympathised rather with Simon the Hellenist, than with the strict Jew who wanted Simon to be suppressed.

§ 2. On the Death of Seleucus and Accession of Antiochus Epiphanes, Jason is made High Priest. Rapid Advance of the Hellenizing Movement.

7–22. The sudden death of Seleucus and accession of his younger brother, Antiochus IV., known as Epiphanes, introduced a new element of discord into Jewish affairs. Jason, or rather Joshua, the brother of Onias, regarded the accession of a new king as favourable to his own ambition, and, having purchased the high-priestly office of Epiphanes, threw himself heart and soul into the Hellenistic movement. He began by erecting a gymnasium after the Grecian fashion in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem (v. 12); after which he discontinued the Temple service (v. 14), aped in all respects Grecian manners, and sent envoys to Tyre, who were to take part in a sacrifice to Melkarth, the Tyrian Hercules (v. 19). He also obtained for the inhabitants of Jerusalem the citizenship of Antioch, and taught them to call themselves Antiochians (vv. 9, 19).

7. after the death of Seleucus.] Nothing is known of the death of Seleucus beyond the bare fact that he was plotted against and slain by Heliodorus, one of his courtiers (App. 'Syriac.' § 46), who is probably identical with the "treasurer" or "minister" of ch. iii. 7–40. Heliodorus seized the throne, but was in a little time driven from it by Eumenes of Pergamus, who had espoused the cause of Antiochus, Seleucus' brother.

when Antiochus, called Epiphanes, took the kingdom.] On the name "Epiphanes," see the comment on 1 Macc. i. 10. Epiphanes received the kingdom from Eumenes in B.C. 176. He reigned till B.C. 164.

Jason the brother of Onias.] The original name of Jason was Joshua (Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 5, § 1). In connection with his general Hellenizing policy, he changed his name into Jason, the Greek appellation which most nearly approached to it.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 175. ther of Onias laboured underhand to be high priest,

8 Promising unto the king by intercession three hundred and threescore talents of silver, and of another revenue eighty talents:

9 Beside this, he promised to assign an hundred and fifty more, if he might have licence to set him up [b] a place for exercise, and for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen, and to write them of Jerusalem by the name of Antiochians.

[b] 1 Mac. 1. c.

10 Which when the king had granted, and he had gotten into his hand the rule, he forthwith brought his own nation to the Greekish fashion. B. C. cir. 175.

11 And the royal privileges granted of special favour to the Jews by the means of [c] John the father of Eupolemus, who went ambassador to Rome for amity and aid, he took away; and putting down the governments which were according to the law, he brought up new customs against the law:

[c] See 1 Mac. 8. 17.

12 For he built gladly a place of exercise under the tower itself, and brought the chief young men under his subjection, and made them wear a hat.

laboured underhand to be high priest.] Josephus knows nothing of Jason having supplanted his brother in the high priesthood, or bought the dignity of Epiphanes. On the contrary, he regards him as having succeeded regularly to the office at his brother's death, the only son left behind him by Onias being still a child, and therefore ineligible ('A. J.' l. s. c.).

8. by intercession.] Rather, "at an interview." The present equivalent of 440 talents would be above 75,000*l.* sterling. It appears by the later narrative (v. 23) that the money was not paid till three years afterwards.

9. he promised to assign an hundred and fifty more.] Rather, "he promised to give a written undertaking for a hundred and fifty more."

to set him up a place for exercise.] See 1 Macc. i. 14, and the comment ad loc.

for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen.] Nothing is said in the original about "the fashions of the heathen," nor was the place intended to be one of general education. A "gymnasium" and "ephebia" was an exercise-ground for the bodily training and recreation of young men, whose mental and moral training was otherwise provided for. Still the institution was so thoroughly Greek, and so much at variance with staid Hebrew habits, that it could not but exert a very great influence over the general tone of morals and manners. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 294; Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 291.)

and to write them of Jerusalem by the name of Antiochians.] Rather, "and to register as Antiochians all those who dwelt in Jerusalem." There was, it would seem, a "citizenship of Antioch," as there was a citizenship of Rome, which could be freely imparted to non-residents. There are coins which mention such a class of persons at Ptolemaïs (Mionnet, 'Description des Médailles,' tom. v. pp. 37, 88, 216; tom. viii. p. 30, &c.). Jason obtained this citizenship for the people of Jerusalem. What rights it conferred is uncertain.

10. when . . . he had gotten into his hand the rule.] I.e. the high-priestly office, with the civil power which at this time belonged to it.

he forthwith brought.] Rather, "proceeded to bring" (the imperfect tense).

11. the royal privileges granted of special favour to the Jews.] Those given by Antiochus the Great (Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 3, § 3) are, it is probable, especially meant. The most important of these was the right of being governed by their own laws (πολιτευέσθωσαν πάντες οἱ ἐκ τοῦ ἔθνους κατὰ τοὺς πατρῴους νόμους).

by the means of John the father of Eupolemus.] Compare 1 Macc. viii. 17. We have no further knowledge of this "John," or of the part which he played in obtaining the privileges from Antiochus. He was evidently a less famous man than his son.

who went ambassador to Rome.] In B.C. 162–1. For an account of the embassy, see 1 Macc. viii. 17–32.

putting down the governments.] Rather, "the modes of government."

12. under the tower itself.] Rather, "under the citadel." The particular "tower" (ἄκρα), of which we hear so much in the First Book, was not yet built (see 1 Macc. i. 33). What is here intended would seem to be the southern or south-western hill, the loftiest part of the entire site. The writer regards it as aggravation of Jason's offence, that he built the gymnasium so near the city.

made them wear a hat.] To moderns this

B. C. cir. 175.

13 Now such was the height of Greek fashions, and increase of heathenish manners, through the exceeding profaneness of Jason, that ungodly wretch, and no high priest;

14 That the priests had no courage to serve any more at the altar, but despising the temple, and neglecting the sacrifices, hastened to be partakers of the unlawful allowance in the place of exercise, after the game of ‖Discus called them forth;

15 Not setting by the honours of their fathers, but liking the glory of the Grecians best of all.

‖ Or, the Discus, which was a stone with an hole in the midst.

16 By reason whereof sore calamity came upon them: for they had them to be their enemies and avengers, whose custom they followed so earnestly, and unto whom they desired to be like in all things.

B. C. cir. 175.

17 For it is not a light thing to do wickedly against the laws of God: but the time following shall declare these things.

18 Now when the game that was used every fifth year was kept at Tyrus, the king being present,

19 This ungracious Jason sent ‖special messengers from Jerusalem,

‖ Gr. who were religious ambassadors does not appear a great offence. But the particular hat mentioned—the broad-brimmed hat or petasus—was discredited in Jewish eyes by its association with figures of Mercury, the presiding god of gymnasia, and so seemed almost an idolatrous emblem.

13. Jason, that ungodly wretch, and no high priest.] Unworthy, i.e., to be counted among the real High Priests. (Compare St. Paul, of himself, "that am not meet to be called an apostle.")

14. the priests had no courage.] Rather, "no readiness," or "no inclination." As Dean Stanley says, "The priests in the Temple caught the infection, left their sacrificial duties unfinished, and ran down from the Temple court to take part in the spectacle as soon as they heard the signal . . . which was to lead off the games" ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 291).

the unlawful allowance.] Rather, "the unlawful shows" or "exhibitions." A large outlay was made by the authorities to render the gymnasia attractive. They were a kind of "People's parks," which it cost a good deal to keep up. Athletes contended in them; rhetoricians declaimed; jugglers probably exhibited their tricks. The office of γυμνασιαρχής, or provider of the gymnasia with whatever was required to make them attractive, was reckoned a very expensive one.

after the game of Discus called them forth.] Rather, "after the proclamation of the disk-throwing had been made." The exercises opened with disk, or quoit, throwing, which was itself preceded by a πρόκλησις—an invitation to all who wished to take part in it.

15. Not setting by the honours of their fathers &c.] This is scarcely intelligible. Translate—"not setting store by the honours which their sires esteemed, but deeming those glories the highest which were approved by the Greeks."

16. By reason whereof sore calamity came upon them.] The writer views the desecration of the Temple by Antiochus, and the persecution that followed, as a judgment on the nation for the levity with which it had welcomed the first departures from ancient Hebrew practice, and introduction of Hellenic novelties. There was a special Nemesis, he considers, in the instruments of their chastisement being the very people whose manners and customs on some points they had been so eager to make their own.

whose custom.] Rather, "whose customs."

17. the time following shall declare these things.] I.e. "the course of time will always shew that it is no light matter to do wickedly against God's laws."

18. when the game that was used every fifth year was kept at Tyrus.] The "Great Games" of Greece were celebrated either every alternate year, or once in four years. The greatest of all—the Olympian and the Pythian—fell under the latter category. And such was also the case with this festival at Tyre, which was perhaps an imitation of the Olympic one (Grimm).

the king being present.] Epiphanes was a lover of shows and games (Polyb. xxxi. 3, 4). and naturally attended so important a festival as this seems to have been. Jason probably sent his gift on account of Epiphanes being there, to draw the king's attention to his Hellenizing zeal.

19. This ungracious Jason.] Rather, "this wicked Jason."

sent special messengers.] Rather, "sacred envoys." The word (θεωροί) is used only of messengers sent on a sacred errand.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 174. who were Antiochians, to carry three hundred drachms of silver to the sacrifice of Hercules, which even the bearers thereof thought fit not to bestow upon the sacrifice, because it was not convenient, but to be reserved for other charges.

20 This money then, in regard of the sender, was appointed to Hercules' sacrifice; but because of the bearers thereof, it was employed to the making of gallies.

cir. 173. 21 Now when Apollonius the son of Menestheus was sent into Egypt for the coronation of king Ptolemeus Philometor, Antiochus, understanding him not to be well affected to his affairs, provided for his own safety: whereupon he came to Joppe, and from thence to Jerusalem:

B. C. cir. 173.

‖ Or, enthronizing.

22 Where he was honourably received of Jason, and of the city, and was brought in with torch light, and with great shoutings: and so afterward went with his host unto Phenice.

who were Antiochians.] See the comment on v. 9.

three hundred drachms of silver.] This is so small a sum—less than 10*l.* sterling—that the reading is with reason suspected. Several MSS. and the Syriac Version have 3,300, which is a far more likely amount.

the sacrifice of Hercules.] The Tyrian Melkarth was identified by the Greeks with their own Hercules, though on no very sufficient grounds. He was more properly an aspect of Baal, the Sun-god—Baal viewed as "the king of the city," the special guardian and protector of Tyre. (See 'Ancient Religions,' pp. 161, 162.)

which even the bearers . . . thought fit not to bestow upon the sacrifice.] The bearers were more scrupulous than their master. They shrank from making an offering to a heathen god, regarding it as "not convenient," or rather as "unfitting." They applied the money therefore to a different purpose. (See v. 20.)

20. This money . . . was appointed.] Our translators read ἔπεσεν for ἔπεμψεν, with three or four MSS., which certainly gives a better sense.

it was employed to the making of gallies.] The bearers gave it to the Syrian king, as a contribution towards the expenses of his navy.

21. Apollonius the son of Menestheus.] "Son of Menestheus" is added, to distinguish him from the "son of Thraseas," of whom we have heard in ch. iii. 5–7; iv. 4. Grimm conjectures that he may be the Apollonius who headed an embassy sent to Rome by Epiphanes, mentioned in Livy (xlii. 6).

for the coronation of king Ptolemeus Philometor.] The meaning of the word πρωτοκλίσια is very obscure; but of all the significations suggested "coronation," or rather "inthronisation," is perhaps the best—the word being equivalent to prima sessio in solio. This event took place in B.C. 173, eight years after his accession, on the death of his mother, when he had attained the age of fifteen. Antiochus Epiphanes had then been king three years.

Antiochus, understanding him not to be well affected to his affairs.] The alienation of Philometor from Antiochus was the work of his ministers Eulæus and Lenæus, in whose hands the weak boy was a mere tool. Deeming Epiphanes half a madman, they thought it would be easy to deprive him of Cœlesyria and Palestine, and recover them to the Ptolemæan kingdom. They therefore made demands which could not be acceded to, and plunged Egypt into war.

he came to Joppe.] By sea, probably, from Seleucia, the port of Antioch.

22. Where he was honourably received.] Rather, "magnificently received."

was brought in with torch light.] Processions where torches were held in the hand are mentioned among the religious ceremonies of the Greeks; but a torch-light reception of a great man by a town seems to have been an illumination of the town by means of torches placed along the roofs of the houses. (See Athen. 'Deipnosoph.' iv. 29.)

§ 3. Menelaus obtains the High Priesthood from Antiochus. Flight of Jason.

23–28. Three years after his purchase of the high-priestly office, Jason sent the sum of money which he had undertaken to pay to Antiochus, by the hands of a certain Menelaus, whom Josephus makes his brother, but whom our author calls the brother of Simon the Benjamite (ch. iii. 4). Arrived at the Court, Menelaus took the opportunity to undermine Jason, and, by the promise of a much larger sum than he had paid, induced Antiochus to depose Jason, and transfer the high priesthood to himself. Jason, upon receiving the intelligence, fled into the country of the Ammonites. Not long afterwards, Menelaus, having failed

B. C. cir. 171. 23 Three years afterward Jason sent Menelaus, the aforesaid Simon's brother, to bear the money unto the king, and to put him in mind of certain necessary matters.

24 But he being brought to the presence of the king, when he had magnified him for the glorious appearance of his power, got the priesthood to himself, offering more than Jason by three hundred talents of silver.

25 So he came with the king's mandate, bringing nothing worthy the high priesthood, but having the fury of a cruel tyrant, and the rage of a savage beast. B. C. cir. 171.

26 Then Jason, who had undermined his own brother, being undermined by another, was compelled to flee into the country of the Ammonites.

27 So Menelaus got the principality: but as for the money that he had promised unto the king, he took no good order for it, albeit Sostratus the ruler of the castle required it:

28 For unto him appertained the gathering of the customs. Wherefore they were both called before the king.

to pay the sum which he had promised, was summoned to Antioch.

23. Three years afterward.] Probably in B.C. 171.

Menelaus, the aforesaid Simon's brother.] According to Josephus, Simon, the son of Onias II., had three sons—Onias III., Jason, and a second Onias, who took the name of Menelaus ('A. J.' xii. 4, § 10; 5, § 1). After Jason had supplanted Onias III., a civil war broke out between him and his brother, Menelaus, in which the latter was worsted; whereupon he appealed to Antiochus, who made him High Priest and deprived Jason. It is impossible to reconcile this account with our author's. We must necessarily choose between them. The primary objection to our author's statement is, that Menelaus, if a Benjamite, could not be a priest, much less High Priest. It is a sufficient reply to this, that the Syrian kings had no regard for the Jewish Law, and that Antiochus was at this time aiming at its entire abolition. It is also noticeable that when Alcimus was appointed High Priest by Eupator, confidence was felt in him because, as was said, "One that is a priest of the seed of Aaron is come with this army" (1 Macc. vii. 14), implying previous irregularity. Josephus's statement that two brothers, who both grew up, had the same name, is moreover suspicious.

24. offering more than Jason by three hundred talents.] Three hundred talents would be equal to 72,000*l.* of our money. It is not clear whether the payment was to be made once for all, or annually.

25. So he came.] "Returned," i.e. "to Jerusalem."

having the fury of a cruel tyrant.] See below, vv. 34, 39; ch. v. 15, 16.

26. Jason . . was compelled to flee into the country of the Ammonites.] As persistent enemies of Israel (see the comment on 1 Macc. v. 6), the Ammonites would be ready enough to give an asylum to powerful Jewish refugees, who might be counted upon to injure and harass their own countrymen, as Jason afterwards did (ch. v. 5–7).

27. the money that he had promised.] See v. 24.

the ruler of the castle.] Rather, "the commandant of the citadel." On the position of the "citadel," see the comment on v. 12. Sostratus is not elsewhere mentioned.

28. the customs.] Rather, "the taxes." The Syrian commandant in Jerusalem had the duty of collecting all the taxes of the city and province, and of remitting them to the king's treasury. Sostratus claimed that his right extended to the sum which the High Priest had agreed to pay for his office. Menelaus disputed this claim, which seems to have been a novel one, since Jason sent his money by his own special messenger (v. 23).

§ 4. MENELAUS, HAVING LEFT HIS BROTHER LYSIMACHUS IN CHARGE AT JERUSALEM, GOES TO ANTIOCH, BUT FINDS THE KING ABSENT, AND ANDRONICUS REGENT. HAVING BRIBED ANDRONICUS WITH SOME OF THE TEMPLE TREASURES, HE IS REBUKED BY ONIAS, WHEREUPON HE PROCURES ONIAS'S DEATH.

29–35. In obedience to the king's summons both Menelaus and Sostratus quitted Jerusalem and went to Antioch, leaving deputies to take their place. On their arrival, they found that the king had quitted the city, in order to put down an insurrection in Cilicia, and had left a certain Andronicus as regent till his return. Menelaus, to ingratiate him-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 171.

29 Now Menelaus left his brother Lysimachus in his stead in the priesthood; and Sostratus left Crates, who was governor of the Cyprians.

30 While those things were in doing, they of Tarsus and Mallos made insurrection, because they were given to the king's concubine, called Antiochis.

31 Then came the king in all haste to appease matters, leaving Andronicus, a man in authority, for his deputy. B. C. cir. 171.

32 Now Menelaus, supposing that he had gotten a convenient time, stole certain vessels of gold out of the temple, and gave some of them to Andronicus, and some he sold into Tyrus and the cities round about.

33 Which when Onias knew of a surety, he reproved him, and withdrew himself into a sanctuary at Daphne, that lieth by Antiochia.

self with the regent, presented him with some golden vessels, which he was believed to have stolen from the Temple. Hereupon Onias, the ex-High Priest, who was in the neighbourhood, ventured to rebuke him, having previously, however, knowing his danger, taken sanctuary in one of the temples at Daphné. Menelaus had sufficient influence with Andronicus to induce him, contrary to all the Greek notions of what was just and right, to draw forth Onias from his asylum by a promise of safety, and then immediately to violate it by casting him into prison and there putting him to death.

29. Menelaus left his brother Lysimachus in his stead.] This seems to be the true meaning, though the word translated "in his stead" is διάδοχος, which commonly signifies a "successor." There is a similar use of the word in ch. xiv. 26.

Crates, who was governor of the Cyprians.] This cannot mean, "who was at the time governor of the Cyprians," since the governor would naturally reside in the island, and at any rate would not, while governor, be holding a subordinate post at Jerusalem—not to mention that Cyprus was at the time a dependency of Egypt. Crates must be called "governor of the Cyprians," either as having once held that office under one of the Ptolemies, or else, by prolepsis, as the man who subsequently was appointed governor, when in B.C. 168 Epiphanes conquered the island.

30. they of Tarsus and Mallos.] Tarsus and Mallos were, both of them, Cilician cities—the former the well-known capital of Cilicia Campestris, the latter a less important place in the same region, situated near the sea, to the east of the old bed of the Pyramus, in lat. 36° 36′, long. 35° 20′ nearly. (See Beaufort's 'Karamania,' p. 294.)

they were given to the king's concubine.] It was a practice of the Achæmenian Persians to assign the revenues of one or more cities to individuals as an act of favour. Artaxerxes Longimanus made over the revenues of three Greek cities to Themistocles (Thuc. i. 138); Mnemon gave those of several villages in Syria to Parysatis (Xen. 'Anab.' i. 4, § 9). According to Herodotus, Anthylla, a city of Egypt, was permanently assigned under the Achæmenians, as pin-money, to the wife of the satrap of Egypt for the time being (Herod. ii. 98). The practice is mentioned as a general one by Cicero ('Orat. in Verrem,' iii. 33). It is also noticed by Plato, Athenæus, Cornelius Nepos, Plutarch, and Philostratus.

31. Then came the king.] I.e. Epiphanes departed from Antioch, and went with all speed into Cilicia, to put down the insurrection.

leaving Andronicus.] This Andronicus is not otherwise known. The name is a common one.

32. Menelaus, supposing that he had gotten a convenient time.] It is not clear why the time should have seemed particularly "convenient." Menelaus, being at Antioch, could only have obtained the vessels by requiring his deputy, Lysimachus, to send them, which would have given the affair unnecessary publicity. Probably he had brought the vessels with him from Jerusalem.

stole certain vessels of gold out of the temple.] Literally, "appropriated to himself some of the golden vessels of the temple."

and some he sold into Tyrus.] Rather, "and others he had previously sold."

33. he reproved him, and withdrew himself.] This translation inverts the order of the events. The Greek text states that Onias, "having first withdrawn himself into sanctuary at Daphne, then proceeded to reprove Menelaus."

a sanctuary at Daphne.] Daphné, often spoken of as a "suburb" of Antioch (Dio Cass. li. 7; Am. Marc. xix. 12, § 19), was really situated about five miles to the south-west. It was a sacred precinct, nearly ten miles in circumference, on the northern slope of the hills which shut in the Orontes valley

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 171.

34 Wherefore Menelaus, taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to get Onias into his hands; who being persuaded thereunto, and coming to Onias in deceit, gave him his right hand with oaths; and though he were suspected by him, yet persuaded he him to come forth of the sanctuary: whom forthwith he shut up without regard of justice.

35 For the which cause not only the Jews, but many also of other nations, took great indignation, and were much grieved for the unjust murder of the man.

B. C. cir. 171.

36 And when the king was come again from the places about Cilicia, the Jews that were in the city, and certain of the Greeks that abhorred the fact also, complained because Onias was slain without cause.

37 Therefore Antiochus was heartily sorry, and moved to pity, and wept, because of the sober and upon the south. Naturally a place of extreme beauty, with an abundance of perennial springs and frequent groves of bay and cypress trees (Liban. 'Antioch.' p. 356), it was adorned also by art with several temples and shrines, as well as with numerous statues and fountains. The main temple was one of Apollo and Diana, built by the first Seleucus. That the right of asylum belonged to the place is mentioned by Polyænus ('Strateg.' viii. 50).

that lieth by Antiochia.] The Syrian capital was distinguished from other cities of the same name by the suffix ἐπὶ Δάφνης, "near Daphné." It has been questioned whether, under any circumstances, a religious Jew, such as Onias is represented to have been (ch. iii. 1; iv. 2, &c.), would have consented to take sanctuary in a heathen precinct, especially in one so notorious for licentiousness and debauchery as that of Daphné. But our author, at any rate, did not think such a thing impossible.

34. to get Onias into his hands.] Or, "to put Onias to death." The verb used (χειροῦσθαι) has this sense (Xen. 'Cyrop.' vii. 5, § 30; Ælian, 'Var. Hist.' iv. 5; 3 Macc. vii. 15).

yet persuaded he him to come forth of the sanctuary.] This was a common proceeding. The Greeks had a strong objection to violating the right of sanctuary by actual slaughter of the refugee within the place of asylum, though in hot blood they would do this sometimes (Plutarch, 'Vit. Solon.' § 12); but they thought little of evading the right, and reducing it to a nullity. Sometimes they would surround the asylum, prevent the entrance of food, and, having reduced their victim to the last gasp, remove him without violence, and let him perish just outside the sacred place (Thucyd. i. 134); sometimes they would make the most solemn promises to spare the victim's life, yet cut him down the moment he had left the asylum. It was universally allowed that such conduct was wrong, and the guilt of it attached not merely to the individual, but to his descendants (Herod. v. 70; Thucyd. i. 126–135); but the sin was reckoned less than that of actually violating a sanctuary, and admitted of expiation.

whom forthwith he shut up.] The Vulgate and Syriac versions translate, "he put to death;" and so Wahl and Grimm. But it is admitted that παρακλείω has nowhere else this meaning. Still, the next verse shews that, in point of fact, Andronicus did put Onias to death.

§ 5. ANTIOCHUS AVENGES THE MURDER OF ONIAS BY THE EXECUTION OF ANDRONICUS.

36–38. On his return from Cilicia to Antioch, after the suppression of the revolt, Antiochus found the inhabitants generally, both Jews and Gentiles, in a state of indignation at the murder of Onias. Participating in this feeling himself, since he had greatly respected Onias, he first degraded Andronicus by stripping off his purple robe, and tearing his under garments, and then put him to death on the spot where he had killed the ex-High Priest.

36. the places about Cilicia.] I.e. Tarsus and Mallos. (See v. 30, and the comment ad loc.) the Jews that were in the city.] I.e. in Antioch. The Jewish colony in Antioch was very large, though its numbers cannot be exactly estimated. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. pp. 237, 239, 241.)

and certain of the Greeks . . . complained.] The Greek text rather implies that the Jews alone "complained," but that the Greeks generally sympathised with them.

37. Antiochus was heartily sorry, and moved to pity, and wept.] The character of Antiochus Epiphanes was extraordinary. Dean Stanley's estimate of it has been already quoted. (See the comment on 1 Macc. i. 10.) It was remarkable for its strange inconsistencies and curious combination of opposites. Here we have one of the softer and more pleasing traits. The "Great King" yields to

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 171. modest behaviour of him that was dead.

38 And being kindled with anger, forthwith he took away Andronicus his purple, and rent off his clothes, and leading him through the whole city unto that very place, where he had committed impiety against Onias, there slew he the cursed murderer. Thus the Lord rewarded him his punishment, as he had deserved.

39 Now when many sacrileges had been committed in the city by Lysimachus with the consent of Menelaus, and the bruit thereof was spread abroad, the multitude gathered themselves together against Lysimachus, many vessels of gold being already carried away. B. C. cir. 171.

40 Whereupon the common people rising, and being filled with rage, Lysimachus armed about three thousand men, and began first to offer violence; one Auranus being the Or, Tyrannus.

his feelings, and "weeps" on account of the untimely end of one whom he had admired and respected.

the sober and modest behaviour.] Or, "the sobriety and great modesty." The same two qualities are ascribed to Scipio Æmilianus by Polybius (xxxii. 11, § 8).

38. being kindled with anger.] Rather, "inflamed with anger."

he took away Andronicus his purple.] We have seen in the First Book of the Maccabees that the privilege of wearing purple was confined to a few. (See 1 Macc. viii. 14; x. 20, 62.) Andronicus, as regent (v. 31), had naturally been entitled to the distinction. Stripping his purple off him was like striking a knight's spurs from his heels before executing him.

rent off his clothes.] Rather, "rent his clothes"—i.e. tore them so that they looked like the clothes of a mean person.

leading him through the whole city.] That his disgrace might be seen by all. The proceeding was the converse of that enviable display of such as a king "delighted to honour" in the sight of a whole town, whereof we read in Gen. xli. 43; Esther vi. 11; and 1 Macc. x. 63.

there slew he the cursed murderer.] It has been questioned whether the passage has this meaning. The verb translated "he slew" means ordinarily "he stript off his ornaments" —an impossible signification here: (1) as his ornaments were already taken from him; (2) as such a punishment could not have been regarded by a Jew as equal to his deserts. Ewald would give the word here the meaning of "he banished;" but this is wholly without authority. The Syriac and Vulgate render, "he killed" or "he deprived of life;" and this meaning is etymologically possible, since ἀποκοσμεῖν might conceivably mean, "he removed from the world." The writer affects strange words and strange meanings for his words, and especially endeavours to vary those which express the taking of life. (See above, v. 34, and below, v. 42.)

Thus the Lord rewarded him his punishment.] It is characteristic of the writer to see everywhere the hand of Divine Providence. (Compare ch. iii. 24, 28, 29, 33; v. 20; vi. 12–16, &c.)

§ 6. THE SACRILEGIOUS AND VIOLENT PROCEEDINGS OF LYSIMACHUS CAUSE A TUMULT AT JERUSALEM, WHEREIN HE IS SLAIN.

39–42. In the absence of Menelaus, Lysimachus followed the bad example which he had set, and continued to steal the gold vessels belonging to the Temple. After a time his doings became generally known, and roused public feeling to such an extent that gatherings took place, and insurrection seemed imminent. Hereupon Lysimachus took the initiative, and, arming 3,000 men, let them loose upon the people. A bloody tumult followed, in which Lysimachus himself and many of his partisans were slain.

39. when many sacrileges had been committed.] Literally, "when the temple had been many times robbed."

with the consent of Menelaus.] It is not clear whether Menelaus had returned to Jerusalem from Antioch, or whether he was detained there by Antiochus, either on account of his debt (v. 27), or of the part which he had taken with respect to Onias (v. 34). On the whole it seems most probable that he had been placed under arrest. (See the comment on v. 45.)

40. Lysimachus armed about three thousand men.] Literally, "armed men up to the number of three thousand." It is implied that he gave them the regular offensive and defensive arms of soldiers.

one Auranus being the leader.] Some MSS

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 171. leader, a man far gone in years, and no less in folly.

41 They then seeing the attempt of Lysimachus, some of them caught stones, some clubs, others taking handfuls of dust, that was next at hand, cast them all altogether upon Lysimachus, and those that set upon them.

42 Thus many of them they wounded, and some they struck to the ground, and all of them they forced to flee: but as for the church-robber himself, him they killed beside the treasury.

43 Of these matters therefore there was an accusation laid against Menelaus. B. C. cir. 171.

44 Now when the king came to Tyrus, three men that were sent from the senate pleaded the cause before him:

45 But Menelaus, being now convicted, promised [d] Ptolemee the son of Dorymenes to give him much money, if he would pacify the king toward him. [d] 1 Mac. 3. 38.

46 Whereupon Ptolemee taking the king aside into a certain gallery, as it were to take the air, brought him to be of another mind:

47 Insomuch that he discharged have "one Tyrannus;" but it is unlikely that so familiar a name (Acts xix. 9; Apollod. ii. 4, § 5; Böckh, 'Corp. Inscr.' No. 1732) should have been changed into the otherwise unknown "Auranus." Proclivi lectioni præstat ardua.

41. seeing the attempt of Lysimachus.] Rather, "the attack of Lysimachus."

upon Lysimachus, and those that set upon them.] Literally, "upon Lysimachus and his partisans."

42. the church-robber.] Lysimachus. Their killing him "beside the treasury" may have been accidental, but looks more like a designed act of retribution, like the execution of Andronicus on the very spot where his great crime had been committed (v. 38).

§ 7. MENELAUS, ACCUSED TO ANTIOCHUS AS THE TRUE CAUSE OF THE DISTURBANCES, BRIBES PTOLEMY, SON OF DORYMENES, TO INTERCEDE FOR HIM. BY THIS DEVICE HE ESCAPES, AND HIS ACCUSERS ARE EXECUTED.

43–50. Antiochus, being at Tyre, and having Menelaus with him, as a prisoner whose fate was not yet decided, the Jewish senate sent three commissioners to accuse him to the king as the "fons et origo mali,"—the real originator of all the troubles, both as having begun the plunder of the Temple treasures, and as having set over the city so execrable a governor as Lysimachus. Menelaus upon this, aware of his danger, promised a sum of money to Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, one of Antiochus's courtiers, if he succeeded in getting him pardoned. This Ptolemy did; and Antiochus not only found him innocent of the crimes laid to his charge, but punished his accusers with death. The flagrant injustice of this sentence aroused the indignation of the Tyrians, who, to mark their disapproval, gave the commissioners a magnificent funeral.

43. there was an accusation laid against Menelaus.] Literally, "a trial was impending over Menelaus."

44. three men . . . sent from the senate.] The number may have been chosen with reference to Deut. xix. 15: "At the mouth of two or three witnesses shall the matter be established." On the existence of a Jewish senate, or council, at this time, see the comment on ch. i. 10.

45. Menelaus, being now convicted.] It is difficult to see how this meaning is to be obtained from the Greek. The ordinary reading, λελειμένος, has usually the sense of "being left behind," or "still surviving." Εἰλημμένος, a conjectural reading of Ewald's, would mean "being taken," "being held in fetters." Λείπεσθαι has sometimes the meaning of "being defeated," but scarcely when the matter in contention is a lawsuit. Perhaps Ewald's reading and rendering should be accepted.

Ptolemee the son of Dorymenes.] See 1 Macc. iii. 38; 2 Macc. viii. 8, x. 12, 13. He seems to have succeeded Apollonius in the government of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia.

46. taking the king aside into a certain gallery, as it were to take the air.] If we could accept these details as fact, we should have to suppose that the original author, Jason, had a very exact knowledge of all the particular circumstances of the history, and was either an eye-witness, or wrote from the reports of eye-witnesses. As it is, we cannot but suspect that the epitomator is here introducing some of his "painting" and "encaustic." (See ch. ii. 29.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 171. Menelaus from the accusations, who notwithstanding was cause of all the mischief: and those poor men, who, if they had told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, should have been judged innocent, them he condemned to death.

48 Thus they that followed the matter for the city, and for the people, and for the holy vessels, did soon suffer unjust punishment.

49 Wherefore even they of Tyrus, moved with hatred of that wicked deed, caused them to be honourably buried.

50 And so through the covetousness of them that were of power Menelaus remained still in authority, increasing in malice, and being a great traitor to the citizens. B. C. cir. 171.

CHAPTER V.

2 Of the signs and tokens seen in Jerusalem. 6 Of the end and wickedness of Jason. 11 The pursuit of Antiochus against the Jews. 15 The spoiling of the temple. 27 Maccabeus fleeth into the wilderness.

ABOUT the same time Antiochus prepared his second voyage into Egypt: cir. 171.

2 And then it happened, that through all the city, for the space almost of forty days, there were seen horsemen running in the air, in cloth of gold, and armed with lances, like a band of soldiers,

47. if they had told their cause, yea, before the Scythians.] St. Paul in one place uses the word "Scythian" as an equivalent for "barbarian" (Col. iii. 11), as does Cicero frequently ('Orat. in Verr.' ii. 5, § 58; 'Orat. in Pison.' § 8). So also does the writer of the Third Book of Maccabees (vii. 5). According to the pictures drawn by Herodotus (iv. 1–142) and Hippocrates ('De Aere, Aqua, et Locis,' § 47), the savagery of the nation was of an extreme type. (See 'Ancient Monarchies,' vol. ii. pp. 222–226.)

48. they that followed the matter for the city.] Rather, "they who had pleaded on behalf of their city."

49. caused them to be honourably buried.] Rather, "conducted their obsequies with magnificence."

50. a great traitor to the citizens.] Rather, "a great plotter against his fellow-citizens." (See below, ch. v. 15, 16, 23.)

CHAPTER V.

§ 8. THE SIGNS AND WONDERS SEEN IN JERUSALEM DURING THE TIME OF EPIPHANES' SECOND EXPEDITION INTO EGYPT.

1–4. Epiphanes had invaded Egypt in B.C. 172, taking the offensive, as Ptolemy refused to remain at peace. He now, B.C. 171, invaded it a second time. During his absence, strange portents appeared in the sky through a space of nearly six weeks, armed hosts seeming to contend one with the other. As calamity was thought to be portended, the Jews prayed that the evil, whatever it was, might not fall on their nation.

1. Antiochus prepared his second voyage into Egypt.] Literally, "his second journey;" but the meaning is, "his second expedition." On the circumstances of the first expedition, see the comment on 1 Macc. i. 16–19. In the second expedition, Antiochus took Pelusium and Memphis, and obtained possession of the person of Ptolemy Philometor; but Philometor's brother, Physcon, still maintained himself at Alexandria. (See Polyb. xxviii. 20–22; Appian, 'Syriac.' § 66.)

2. through all the city.] "The city" is here Jerusalem, as generally with our author (ch. iii. 14; iv. 39; v. 5, 17; viii. 3, &c.), though not always (ch. iv. 36).

for the space almost of forty days.] "Forty" is not only a "sacred" number with the Hebrews, but it has always been a common "round" number with Orientals, who will use it whenever the actual number exceeds twenty and falls short of a hundred. Thus the ruined palace at Persepolis is called that of "the forty pillars;" a generation is "forty years;" Abdon has "forty sons" who ride on "forty ass colts" (Judg. xii. 14); a numerous band of robbers is spoken of as "the Forty Thieves," &c. Here there is an (unusual) admission, that the number is not exact.

there were seen horsemen running in the air.] Such sights have frequently been reported, and seem to be quite possible, through a peculiar state of atmosphere, which intensifies refraction and reflection. Tacitus says, in speaking of the last Jewish war: "Visæ per cælum concurrere acies, rutilantia arma" ('Hist.' v. 13). Josephus gives it as the statement of many eye-witnesses, that at this time chariots and armed squadrons were seen in the air throughout the length and breadth of the land

B. C. cir. 171.

3 And troops of horsemen in array, encountering and running one against another, with shaking of shields, and multitude of ‖ pikes, and drawing of swords, and casting of darts, and glittering of golden ornaments, and harness of all sorts.

‖ Or, staves.

4 Wherefore every man prayed that that apparition might turn to good.

5 Now when there was gone forth a false rumour, as though Antiochus had been dead, Jason took at the least a thousand men, and suddenly made an assault upon the city; and they that were upon the walls being put back, and the city at length taken, Menelaus fled into the castle:

B. C. cir. 171.

6 But Jason slew his own citizens without mercy, not considering that ('Bell. Jud.' vi. 5, § 3). Moderns add similar testimony (Brewster, 'Natural Magic,' pp. 201–223; edit. of 1883). As ships at sea have frequently been seen in the sky by abnormal refraction and reflection, so may armed hosts be seen, when a country is alive with soldiers marching and counter-marching. On the other hand, under excitement of feeling, men may see in mere clouds a semblance of armies.

in cloth of gold.] Literally, "in gold apparel." (Compare Polyb. xxxi. 3, § 13.) On the actual use of gold or gilded armour, see the comment on ch. iii. 25.

3. encountering and running one against another.] Rather, "charging and making raids"—some of course doing the one, some the other.

glittering of golden ornaments.] Orientals usually indulge in this species of display. The greater part of a man's wealth is often carried openly upon his person. Herodotus speaks of the Persians slain at Platæa as having worn bracelets and chains and scimitars with golden ornaments (ix. 80). Xenophon says that golden earrings and collars were worn by the Persians generally ('Anab.' i. 2, § 27). The Syro-Macedonians had probably adopted this practice, together with other Persian customs.

harness of all sorts.] Rather, "corslets of all manner of kinds." These were sometimes of linen (Herod. ii. 182; iii. 47), more commonly of metal, which was either of a single piece, like the breastplates of modern cuirassiers, or made of scales, one overlaying another (ib. ix. 22).

4. every man prayed that that apparition might turn to good.] The appearances were taken as portending war. The Jews prayed that the war might turn out to their advantage and not to their hurt.

§ 9. On a Rumour of the Death of Epiphanes, Jason makes an Attack upon Jerusalem. His Attack fails. His unhappy Fate.

5–10. On quitting Jerusalem, Jason had taken up his abode in the Ammonite country to the east of the Jordan. There he could easily watch the course of events, and be ready to take advantage of any turn in affairs that might seem to give him a chance of re-establishing himself. The report that Epiphanes had died in Egypt seemed to him just the opportunity which he needed. Though he could hastily raise no more than about a thousand men, he swooped on Jerusalem, took the town all but the citadel, whither Menelaus retired, and proceeded to revenge himself upon his nation by numerous cruelties. He was, however, compelled after a short time to evacuate the city and retreat across the Jordan. Here he was attacked by Aretas, an Arabian chief, who drove him from place to place, till at last he was obliged to take refuge in Egypt with the Ptolemies. Eventually he retired to Lacedæmon, where he claimed protection as being of a kindred race, but lived and died unhonoured.

5. when there was gone forth a false rumour, as though Antiochus had been dead.] It is impossible to say how this report arose. Antiochus does not appear to have run any risk of his life in Egypt. He was successful from first to last, and would have completed the conquest of the country, but for the Romans.

the city . . . taken.] Rather, "on the point of being taken." That Jason should so nearly have succeeded in his attempt when he was at the head of only a thousand men, must be accounted for, first, by the suddenness of his attack; and, secondly, by his having many partisans within the walls. It must be borne in mind that he was the legitimate High Priest.

Menelaus fled into the castle.] Rather, "into the citadel." See the comment on ch. iv. 12.

6. Jason slew his own citizens without mercy.] The original is still stronger. It implies that the ex-High Priest, during the time that he held the city, made repeated massacres of the unresisting citizens.

not considering, &c.] Literally, "not considering that to gain the day over his own kinsmen was the greatest possible loss of the day for himself; but imagining that he was

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 171. to get the day of them of his own nation would be a most unhappy day for him; but thinking they had been his enemies, and not his countrymen, whom he conquered.

7 Howbeit for all this he obtained not the principality, but at the last received shame for the reward of his treason, and fled again into the country of the Ammonites.

8 In the end therefore he had an unhappy return, being accused before Aretas the king of the Arabians, fleeing from city to city, pursued of all men, hated as a forsaker of the laws, and being had in abomination as an open ‖enemy of his country and countrymen, he was cast out into Egypt.

B. C. cir. 171.

‖ Or, executioner.

9 Thus he that had driven many out of their country perished in a strange land, retiring to the Lacedemonians, and thinking there to find succour by reason of his kindred:

10 And he that had cast out many unburied had none to mourn for him, nor any solemn funerals at all, nor sepulchre with his fathers.

erecting trophies of victories over enemies, and not over his countrymen."

7. he obtained not the principality.] He did not succeed in ousting Menelaus and re-establishing himself in the civil governorship of Jerusalem. On the contrary, as Menelaus held out, and Antiochus started for Jerusalem "in a furious mind" (v. 11), as soon as he heard of Jason's attack, he felt compelled to retreat, and to place the Jordan between himself and the Syro-Macedonian monarch.

and fled again.] See ch. iv. 26.

8. In the end therefore he had an unhappy return.] Many other renderings have been proposed; but on the whole this seems to be the best. Ἔπειτα is used adverbially, as τέλος so often; and ἀναστροφὴ is to be preferred to καταστροφή—the reading of several MSS.—and understood of Jason's "turning back" to the point from which he started.

being accused before Aretas.] Our translators, following Luther and Grotius, have preferred the reading ἐγκληθεὶς to ἐγκλεισθείς. But the latter has far more authority than the former, and yields at least an equally good sense. Aretas "imprisoned" Jason, who escaped, and fled from city to city, everywhere an object of hatred, until at last he was, as it were, "thrust" into Egypt. No doubt the passage is coloured by Jewish animosity; but its main facts may be accepted. The supplanter of the good Onias, the first purchaser of the high priesthood, the introducer into Jerusalem of a Greek gymnasium, the sacrificer (so far as intention went) to Hercules, had a miserable ending, wandered from land to land, and died in poverty and exile.

the king of the Arabians.] Aretas is often found as the name of Arab chiefs. It is perhaps the native Harith. An Aretas, whose capital was Petra, had a war with Herod Antipas (Joseph. 'A. J.' xviii. 5, § 1), and subsequently held Damascus for a time, soon after the conversion of St. Paul (2 Cor. xi. 32). Another, called also Obedas, was engaged in a war with Alexander Jannæus (Joseph. 'A. J.' xiii. 13, § 5) about B.C. 79, and was afterwards attacked by the Roman general, Scaurus (ibid. xiv. 5, § 1). The Aretas of the present passage is distinct from both of these.

he was cast out into Egypt.] In Egypt he would be sure of a refuge, as an enemy of Epiphanes.

9. Thus he that had driven many out.] Rather, "And he that had driven," &c. The writer sees in the ultimate fate of Jason another instance of exact retribution, and so of strict justice, as defined by the poet—εἴ κε πάθοι τά κ' ἔρεξε, δίκη κ' ἰθεῖα γένοιτο. (Compare ch. iv. 38.)

the Lacedemonians, . . . his kindred.] See 1 Macc. xii. 7, 10, 21; Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' i. 26, § 1. Utterly unfounded as was the idea of a connection between races so entirely unlike in all respects as the Spartans and the Jews, it was apparently accepted as a fact by both nations.

10. nor sepulchre with his fathers.] To be "gathered to their fathers" was always the Jews' desire in death (Gen. xlix. 30, 31; 2 Kings xi. 43, xiv. 31, &c.; 1 Macc. ix. 19, xiii. 25). It was felt as the denunciation of a heavy penalty, when the sentence went forth: "Thy carcase shall not come into the sepulchre of thy fathers" (1 Kings xiii. 22). Ancestral tombs were sunk deep in the rock, which received generation after generation. In every case there was a desire at least to rest in the holy soil, and not in the unsanctified earth of a "strange land."

§ 10. Return of Antiochus from his Second Egyptian Campaign. He vents his Fury upon the Jews by Massacres in the City, and by the Plundering of the Temple. Menelaus abets his Proceedings.

11–21. Antiochus was disappointed with the results of the Egyptian war. Though he

B. C. cir. 171.

11 Now when this that was done came to the king's ear, he thought that Judea had revolted: whereupon [a] removing out of Egypt in a furious mind, he took the city by force of arms,

[a] 1 Mac. 1. 10, &c.

12 And commanded his men of war not to spare such as they met, and to slay such as went up upon the houses.

13 Thus there was killing of young and old, making away of men, women, and children, slaying of virgins and infants.

14 And there were destroyed within the space of three whole days fourscore thousand, whereof forty thousand were slain in the conflict; and no fewer sold than slain.

B. C. cir. 171.

15 Yet was he not content with this, but presumed to go into the most holy temple of all the world; Menelaus, that traitor to the laws, and to his own country, being his guide:

16 And taking the holy vessels with polluted hands, and with pro-had been generally successful, yet Alexandria had escaped him, and the representations of foreign powers had induced him to forego almost all the advantages which he had gained. The disturbances in Jerusalem during his absence (*vv.*5–7) had also displeased him, and he needed a scapegoat on which he might vent his fury. He was likewise terribly in want of money; and recent events had made it clear, 1. That there was a vast accumulation of treasure at Jerusalem; and 2. That there was a strong party among the Jews themselves which would connive at the conversion of these treasures to secular purposes. Epiphanes therefore resolved to treat Jerusalem as a revolted city—to assault it, take it, and plunder it. Our author says that 80,000 of the inhabitants were slain in the assault and massacre, and an equal number sold as slaves. Menelaus served Epiphanes as guide to the Temple treasures, which were plundered and carried off, to the amount of 1800 talents (432,000*l.*).

11. he thought that Judea had revolted.] This might naturally be the first impression that the tidings made; but it is impossible that Epiphanes should not have been better informed before he gave the order for the assault. He must have become aware that, whatever Jason's intentions may have been—and it is improbable that even he had aimed at shaking off the Syro-Macedonian yoke—Jason had been foiled, and the authority of Menelaus re-established. The assault can only be looked on as a wanton outrage, for which the motive was cupidity. The Syrian treasury needed replenishing. No easier mode of filling it offered than the seizure of half a million of money and the sale of 80,000 (or even 10,000) captives.

12. such as went up upon the houses.] They were to kill all whom they found in the streets, and all who took post upon the house-roofs in what might be viewed as a threatening attitude.

13. The point of this verse is the promiscuous character of the slaughter. Neither age nor sex was spared. Young and old, men and women, even infants, were ruthlessly massacred.

14. three whole days.] Rather, "three days altogether." The massacre was continued on into the third day.

fourscore thousand.] It may be suspected that this number is exaggerated. The writer's numbers are frequently suspicious (ch. viii. 20, 30; ch. x. 17, 31; ch. xi. 11, &c.); and here he seems greatly to over-estimate the population of Jerusalem, which he makes considerably more than 160,000. Josephus ('A. J.' xii. 4, § 5) does not say how many were killed on this occasion, but gives the number of the prisoners as "about ten thousand." The slain are not likely to have much exceeded this amount.

no fewer sold.] On the practice of selling captives as slaves, see 1 Macc. iii. 41; 2 Macc. viii. 10, 11.

15. presumed to go into.] Compare 1 Macc. i. 21; Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 4, § 5.

the most holy temple of all the world.] See above, ch. ii. 22; iii. 12.

16. the holy vessels.] Cyrus had made over to Zerubbabel a number of the original vessels of Solomon, which Nebuchadnezzar had carried off. These consisted of 5,400 vessels in all (Ezra i. 11). Artaxerxes Longimanus had subsequently made a present of further vessels to the Temple by the hand of Ezra (ibid. vii. 19). Others may have been added by successive high priests. These "holy vessels" had, it would appear, until the high-priesthood of Menelaus, remained intact. Menelaus, first of all, laid his profane hands upon them (ch. iv. 32, 39, 42). Epiphanes now, at one fell swoop, carried off the remainder. (Compare 1 Macc. i. 21–23.)

with polluted hands . . . with profane hands.] Rather, "with his polluted hands . . . with his profane hands."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 170. fane hands pulling down the things that were dedicated by other kings to the augmentation and glory and honour of the place, he gave them away.

17 And so haughty was Antiochus in mind, that he considered not that the Lord was angry for a while for the sins of them that dwelt in the city, and therefore his eye was not upon the place.

18 For had they not been formerly wrapped in many sins, this man, as soon as he had come, had forthwith been scourged, and put back from ch. 3. 25, 26. his presumption, [b] as Heliodorus was, whom Seleucus the king sent to view the treasury.

19 Nevertheless God did not choose the people for the place's sake, but the place for the people's sake. B. C. cir. 170.

20 And therefore the place itself, that was partaker with them of the adversity that happened to the nation, did afterward communicate in the benefits sent from the Lord: and as it was forsaken in the wrath of the Almighty, so again, the great Lord being reconciled, it was set up with all glory.

21 So when Antiochus had carried out of the temple a thousand and eight hundred talents, he departed in all haste unto Antiochia, weening in his pride to make the land navigable, and the sea passable by foot: such was the haughtiness of his mind.

pulling down.] Rather, "sweeping off." he gave them away.] This cannot be the author's meaning. The whole object of Epiphanes in plundering the Temple was the replenishment of his treasury. His motive was, as Josephus says, "covetousness" (πλεονεξία). Grimm understands, "he gave them to his servants to convey to Antioch." But possibly the reading is a corrupt one.

17. so haughty was Antiochus.] Rather, "so lifted up."

18. had they not been formerly wrapped in many sins.] Rather, "Had it not chanced that they were wrapped up in many sins." It is the present time, not any earlier one, whereof the writer is speaking.

scourged . . . as Heliodorus was.] See above ch. iii. 26.

Seleucus the king.] I.e. Seleucus IV., called Philopator. (See the comment on ch. iii. 3.)

19. Nevertheless.] Rather, "But." weening in his pride to make the land navigable, and the sea passable by foot.] I.e. thinking himself capable of reversing the order of nature, as Xerxes had done, when he bridged the Hellespont and cut through Athos (Herod. vii. 22–24, 36; Justin. ii. 10, § 24). It is not meant that Epiphanes entertained any such projects.

God did not choose the people for the place's sake.] The Temple was not the end but the means. God's object was to purify to Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. The Temple was hallowed, and sanctified, and protected, and kept free from pollution, in order to help towards the people's purification and sanctification. When the people had corrupted themselves (ch. iv. 12–15), notwithstanding God's care of the Temple, there was no longer any object in maintaining the Temple's sanctity. Its pollution was therefore permitted.

20. the place . . . did afterward communicate in the benefits sent from the Lord.] See below, ch. x. 1–8; compare 1 Macc. iv. 36–59.

21. a thousand and eight hundred talents.] If this is the estimate of the value of the whole booty in the ordinary (Attic) silver talent, the amount would be little short of half a million of our money. If it is a statement of the weight, the value must remain unknown, since we cannot tell what proportion the gold vessels bore to the silver.

§ 11. EPIPHANES CONTINUES HIS OPPRESSION BY HIS INSTRUMENTS, PHILIP, ANDRONICUS, MENELAUS, AND APOLLONIUS. JUDAS MACCABEUS, WITH NINE OTHERS, RETIRES TO THE WILDERNESS.

22–27. Not content with the cruelties which he had superintended in person, Epiphanes, on quitting Jerusalem, left a heathen governor in the city further to oppress the people, and also left another in Samaria, besides confirming Menelaus in the high-priestly office. After his arrival at Antioch —two years after, according to 1 Macc. i. 29 —he further sent his chief officer of revenue, Apollonius (probably the person who is called "governor of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia" in ch. iii. 5; iv. 4), to commit fresh atrocities. Apollonius made a great massacre of the males on the Sabbath day, and, seizing the

B. C. cir. 170.

22 And [c] he left governors to vex the nation: at Jerusalem, Philip, for his country a Phrygian, and for manners more barbarous than he that set him there;

[c] 1 Mac. 1. 51.

23 And at Garizim, Andronicus; and besides, Menelaus, who worse than all the rest bare an heavy hand over the citizens, having a malicious mind against his countrymen the Jews.

cir. 168.

24 He sent also [d] that detestable ringleader Apollonius with an army of two and twenty thousand, commanding him to slay all those that were in their best age, and to sell the women and the younger sort:

[d] 1 Mac. 1. 29.

B. C. cir. 168.

25 Who coming to Jerusalem, and pretending peace, did forbear till the holy day of the sabbath, when taking the Jews keeping holy day, he commanded his men to arm themselves.

26 And so he slew all them that were gone to the celebrating of the sabbath, and running through the city with weapons slew great multitudes.

‖ Gr. who was the tenth.

[e] 1 Mac. 1. 53. Hebr 11. 38.

27 But Judas Maccabeus ‖ with nine others, or thereabout, [e] with-women and children, sold them as slaves. Upon this, Judas Maccabeus, with nine others, withdrew from the city into the wilderness, and lived on the wild fruits of the earth, becoming the nucleus of the rebellion which followed.

22. Philip . . . a Phrygian.] "Philip the Phrygian" must have continued to be governor of Jerusalem through all the time of the severe persecution (chs. vi.–vii.), since we find him still at the head of affairs in B.C. 166–5, when he sends to the governor of Cœlesyria to help him against the rebels under Judas (ch. viii. 8).

23. And at Garizim, Andronicus.] "Garizim" seems to be used here as an equivalent of Samaria. Properly it was the name of the hill on which the Samaritans had built their temple (John iv. 20: "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain"). The Syro-Macedonians seem at this time to have confounded the Samaritans with the Jews, and to have looked on both with equal suspicion. Samaria had therefore to be garrisoned, and to receive a Syro-Macedonian governor. He has been supposed to be the Andronicus of ch. iv. 31–38; but we have shewn reasons for believing that that individual suffered death before this. (See the comment on ch. iv. 38.)

24. that detestable ringleader.] Rather, "that ringleader of corruption." The article (τὸν μυσάρχην) implies that Apollonius is already known to the reader, whence it may be concluded that he is the "governor of Cœlesyria" mentioned in ch. iii. 5; iv. 4. He may have exchanged that office recently for the chief collectorship of revenue which is assigned to him in 1 Macc. i. 29. A Ptolemy is found as governor of Cœlesyria in B.C. 166–5 (2 Macc. viii. 8).

all those that were in their best age.] Rather, "all those of the military age"—i.e. all those between 17 and 47, or whatever were the limits of military service recognised by the Syro-Macedonians.

to sell the women and the younger sort.] Compare above, v. 14.

25. did forbear till the holy day of the sabbath.] The Sabbatarian feeling was, we know, strong among those of the religious and patriotic party. At a later date than that to which the narrative has brought us, they still refused to resist attack upon the Sabbath, and allowed themselves to be slaughtered like sheep (1 Macc. ii. 36–38). Apollonius must have calculated upon this feeling.

keeping holy day.] Literally, "resting"—or "observing rest."

26. And so he slew all them that were gone.] Rather, "that were gone forth"—i.e. that had quitted the city, and gone across to the Temple hill, to attend the Temple worship.

and running through the city.] Rather, "into the city." Besides his attack on the worshippers in the Temple, he sent his bands into the city on the western hill, and there killed "great multitudes."

27. Judas Maccabeus with nine others.] It is remarkable that the author ignores Mattathias wholly, and makes Judas the leader of the revolt. In this there can be no doubt that he is unhistorical. The authority of the First of Maccabees and of Josephus must override his. Judas, however, it is clear, remained, in the eyes of his countrymen, the great hero of the war of independence—the chief to whom all others were secondary. It was he who first defeated armies; who first made success seem possible; above all, who first recovered and

Digitized By Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 168. drew himself into the wilderness, and lived in the mountains after the manner of beasts, with his company, who fed on herbs continually, lest they should be partakers of the pollution.

CHAPTER VI.

1 The Jews are compelled to leave the law of God. 4 The temple is defiled. 8 Cruelly upon the people and the women. 12 An exhortation to bear affliction, by the example of the valiant courage of Eleazarus, cruelly tortured.

B. C. cir. 168. NOT long after this the king sent an old man of ‖ Athens to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers, and not to live after the laws of God:

‖ Antioch: the Latin interpreters.

2 And to pollute also the temple purified the Temple, and re-established the daily sacrifices.

withdrew himself into the wilderness, and lived in the mountains.] Compare 1 Macc. ii. 26, 27. The place chosen seems to have been "the wilderness of Judea," or the tract south and south-east of Jerusalem, between the great southern road and the Dead Sea.

after the manner of beasts.] This is rhetorical exaggeration. Neither in the time of Judas, nor even in that of Mattathias, were the patriots brought so low as is here asserted. They had always "cattle" (1 Macc. ii. 30), and the spoil of cities (ibid. 44–47; iii. 8), and consequently the ordinary means of sustaining life.

lest they should be partakers of the pollution.] We learn from 1 Macc. ii. 1–28, that Mattathias and his sons did not withdraw into the wilderness until an attempt had been made, at their own village of Modeïn, to force them to offer sacrifice on a heathen altar to heathen gods. It was this "pollution" in which they refused to partake. Compare the conduct of the early Christians (Plin. 'Epist.' x. 97).

CHAPTER VI.

§ 12. A Royal Commissioner sent to Jerusalem with Orders to extirpate the Jewish Religion. His Proceedings with this Object.

1–9. Epiphanes now thought that the time was come when he might be able wholly to obliterate the Jewish religion; and accordingly he sent a commissioner—an Athenian, according to our author—with full powers, and strict orders to put down all Jewish usages. The Temple was to be re-dedicated to Jupiter Olympius; heathen festivals with licentious rites were to be celebrated in it; the altar was to be polluted by the sacrifice of swine upon it; the observance of the Jewish feasts and even of the Sabbath was to be prohibited; circumcision was to be forbidden; the copies of the Law were to be destroyed (1 Macc. i. 56); and the Jews were to be compelled to join in the heathen feasts and sacrifices. Finally, the commands and prohibitions were extended beyond Judæa to the neighbouring Grecian cities; and the Jews of all parts of the Empire were forced under the penalty of death to adopt Gentile customs.

1. Not long after this.] In the same year with the attack of Apollonius (B.C. 168), towards its close—in November or December.

the king sent an old man of Athens.] The Vulgate has "an old man of Antioch"—a reading of which Ewald approves ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 298, note [5]). But, as Antiochus was at the time engaged in building the magnificent temple of Jupiter Olympius at Athens (Polyb. xxvi. 1, § 10), of which the ruins are still to be seen on the banks of the Ilissus, it is quite likely that he may have selected an Athenian to introduce the worship of the same god at Jerusalem. The worship would thus, as Dean Stanley observes ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 295) have seemed to be "introduced from its most genuine seat."

to depart from the laws of their fathers.] Compare 1 Macc. i. 42–50; Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 5, § 4. Josephus says: "He compelled them to lay aside the ceremonial observances of their own God, and to worship the gods whom he acknowledged; to build temples and erect altars in every city and village, and to offer upon them every day a sacrifice of swine. He also forbade them to circumcise their children, and threatened all who should be caught so doing with punishment."

2. to pollute also the temple.] "It was the 23rd of the month Marchesvan (November)," says Dean Stanley ('Lectures,' vol. iii. p. 297), "that the enclosure was broken between the outer and inner court; in after days the breaches were pointed out in thirteen places. On the 15th of the next month (Chisleu—December) a small Grecian altar was planted on the huge platform of the altar of Zerubbabel in honour of the Olympian Jupiter. On the 25th the profanation was consummated by introducing a herd of swine and slaughtering them in the sacred precincts. One huge sow was chosen from the rest. Her blood was poured on the altar before the Temple and on the Holy of Holies

B. C. cir. 168. in Jerusalem, and to call it the temple of Jupiter Olympius; and that in Garizim, of Jupiter the Defender of strangers, ‖ as they did desire that dwelt in the place.

‖ Out of Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 7. or, as they were.

3 The coming in of this mischief was sore and grievous to the people:

4 For the temple was filled with riot and revelling by the Gentiles, who dallied with harlots, and had to do with women within the circuit of the holy places, and besides that brought in things that were not lawful.

5 [a] The altar also was filled with profane things, which the law forbiddeth. B. C. cir. 168.

[a] 1 Mac. 1. 47

6 Neither was it lawful for a man to keep sabbath days or ancient feasts, or to profess himself at all to be a Jew.

7 And in the day of the king's birth every month they were brought by bitter constraint to eat of the sacrifices; and when the feast of Bacchus was kept, the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy.

within. A mess of broth was prepared from the flesh, and sprinkled on the copies of the Law. This was the 'abomination of desolation'—the horror which made the whole place a desert."

the temple of Jupiter Olympius.] Jupiter (Zeus) was worshipped as "Olympian" chiefly at Olympia in Elis (Herod. ii. 7); but Antiochus had recently begun to build a temple to him under the same title at Athens (see the comment on v. 1). He perhaps identified the Greek "Zeus Olympios" with the Roman "Jupiter Capitolinus," to whom he had built a splendid temple at Antioch (Liv. xli. 20).

of Jupiter the Defender of strangers.] Zeus is mentioned as worshipped under this title (Xenius) very frequently by the classical writers (Hom. 'Il.' xiii. 625; 'Od.' i. 270; Æsch. 'Agam.' ll. 61, 362, 748; Pind. 'Ol.' viii. 38; Eurip. 'Cycl.' l. 357; Xen. 'Anab.' iii. 2, § 4; Plat. 'De Leg.' v. 730; Arist. 'De Mundo,' § 7; Pausan. iii. 11, § 11; Athen. 'Deipn.' xv. p. 696, D, &c.). He was regarded as careful to avenge any wrongs suffered either by strangers or by guests or hosts.

as they did desire that dwelt in the place.] Rather, "as they were that dwelt in the place." The writer means that the title was selected in reference to the character of the Samaritans, who were "protectors of strangers" themselves. It is remarkable that a Jew should give this testimony.

3. grievous to the people.] Rather, "grievous even to the multitude." I.e. not only was it disliked by the upper orders, or the more strictly religious, but it was felt as a grievance by the common people generally.

4. revelling.] Literally, "bands of revellers."

who dallied with harlots.] On the licentious character of the Gentile worship at this period, and the indecent orgies permissible in heathen temples, see Döllinger's 'Judenthum und Heidenthum' passim. The Syro-Macedonians were especially addicted to these unspeakable abominations, and Antioch with its notorious suburb of Daphné was the head-quarters of religious profligacy. Hence we may well believe that the charges here made were not without a foundation in fact.

brought in things that were not lawful.] As swine, and broth made from the flesh of swine. (See the comment on v. 2.)

5. The altar . . . was filled with profane things.] It was permanently surmounted by a heathen altar, on which heathen sacrifices were offered. It was trampled on by the feet of the heathen sacrificing priests, and was also on at least one occasion purposely polluted by the pouring upon it of swine's blood (Diod. Sic. xxxiv. 1).

6. Neither was it lawful . . . to keep sabbath days.] Compare 1 Macc. i. 45.

or ancient feasts.] Literally, "ancestral feasts"—those which had come down to the Jews of the day from their forefathers—the Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles, Purim, &c.

7. in the day of the king's birth every month.] Rather, "on the day." It is questioned whether this statement is worthy of belief. No other instance has been as yet found of a king's birthday being kept monthly, and it is thought improbable that even Epiphanes would have introduced such a custom. Grimm suggests that the author has confused the annual royal birthday with the monthly sacrifice mentioned in 1 Macc. i. 59.

when the feast of Bacchus was kept.] In every Greek state "Dionysia" were celebrated at least once a year; in some, as at Athens, they were celebrated twice. Autumn was the usual time for them, the feast being specially connected with the vintage, and its celebration being accompanied with wild dances, coarse gestures and songs, uproar, tumult, and revelry. A "pomp" or "pro-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 168.

Gr. Grecians.

8 Moreover there went out a decree to the neighbour cities of the [g]heathen, by the suggestion of Ptolemee, against the Jews, that they should observe the same fashions, and be partakers of their sacrifices:

9 And whoso would not conform themselves to the manners of the Gentiles should be put to death. Then might a man have seen the present misery.

B. C. cir. 168.

10 For [h]there were two women brought, who had circumcised their children; whom when they had openly led round about the city, the babes hanging at their breasts, they cast them down headlong from the wall.

[h] 1 Mac. 1. 60.

11 And others, that had run together into caves near by, to keep the sabbath day secretly, being discovered to Philip, were all burnt to-cession" was a necessary part of the festival. The worshippers defiled through the streets in a long train, on their way generally to some temple, where sacrifice was to be offered and a sacrificial feast to follow. Ivy was worn by those who went in the procession, as the sacred plant of Dionysus (3 Macc. ii. 29; Eurip. 'Bacch.' l. 81).

8. to the neighbour cities of the heathen.] Rather, "of the Grecians." The cities intended must have lain within the dominions of the Seleucidæ, as Ptolemaïs, Epiphaneia, Apameia, and perhaps Antioch. The Jewish population at Antioch was considerable.

by the suggestion of Ptolemee.] Many MSS., including the Vatican, have "by the suggestion of the Ptolemies," which could only be understood of the Egyptian royal house. But it is inconceivable that the foreign princes who ruled in Egypt should have undertaken to advise Epiphanes on a matter belonging entirely to the internal administration of his own empire. The reading which our translators have followed is therefore greatly to be preferred; and the "Ptolemee" intended is probably "Ptolemee the son of Dorymenes" (ch. iv. 45), who was among the chief advisers of the Syro-Macedonian king.

against the Jews.] The existing text does not admit of the translation, "there went out a decree against the Jews." To obtain this meaning we must change the place of the clause, κατὰ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, which has no meaning where it stands at present.

that they should observe the same fashions.] Literally, "that they should lead the same life."

9. And whoso would not conform . . . should be put to death.] Here was the sting of the decree. Both in Judæa and elsewhere it was made a capital offence to observe Jewish customs, or profess oneself a Jew, or even to possess a copy of the Jewish scriptures. Any one might denounce his neighbour, and death was the consequence. (See 1 Macc. i. 50, 57, 60, 63.)

to the manners of the Gentiles.] Rather, "to the customs of the Greeks" (ἐπὶ τὰ Ἑλληνικά).

Then might a man have seen, &c.] This is a transition clause from the general to the particular. It concludes the writer's survey of the general position of his countrymen under the edicts issued by Epiphanes, and introduces the graphic account which he proceeds to give in the remainder of the chapter and in ch. vii., of the practical results which followed from the edicts.

§ 13. Special Instances of Persecution. Case of the Two Women. Case of those burnt for keeping the Sabbath.

10, 11. The writer proceeds now to adduce special instances of persecution. He begins with the case, noted also by the writer of the First Book (1 Macc. i. 60, 61), of two mothers, who, contrary to the king's edict, had had their children circumcised, who were led round the city, with their children hung around their necks, and then cast headlong from the city wall into the ditch. He next notes a case where persons who had met secretly for worship on the Sabbath day in some of the caves near Jerusalem, were burnt to death in them unresistingly, as their conscience would not allow them to defend themselves on the Sabbath.

10. there were two women brought.] Rather, "brought up," or "brought before the court."

who had circumcised their children.] I.e. "who had caused them to be circumcised." The operation was performed by men. (See 1 Macc. i. 61.)

the babes hanging at their breasts.] Literally, "after they had hung the babes at their breasts."

11. others that had run together into caves near by.] Literally, "into the caves." The limestone rocks of Palestine are everywhere perforated with caves, some natural, some arti-

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 168. gether, because they made a conscience to help themselves for the honour of the most sacred day.

12 Now I beseech those that read this book, that they be not discouraged for these calamities, but that they judge those punishments not to be for destruction, but for a chastening of our nation.

13 For it is a token of his great goodness, when wicked doers are not suffered any long time, but forthwith punished.

14 For not as with other nations, whom the Lord patiently forbeareth to punish, till they be come to the fulness of their sins, so dealeth he with us, B. C. cir. 168.

15 Lest that, being come to the height of sin, afterwards he should take vengeance of us.

16 And therefore he never withdraweth his mercy from us: and though he punish with adversity, yet doth he never forsake his people.

17 But let this that we have spoken be for a warning unto us. And now will we come to the declaring of the matter in few words. cir. 167.

ficial, and often capable of containing a considerable assemblage of persons. The "cave of Adullam" (1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13) is notorious. Other scriptural notices of caves in Palestine are Gen. xxiii. 17; Josh. x. 16; 1 Sam. xxiv. 3; 1 Kings xviii. 4; Heb. xii. 38.

being discovered to Philip.] I.e. to "Philip the Phrygian," the Syro-Macedonian governor of Jerusalem (ch. v. 22).

were all burnt together.] Perhaps rather suffocated than burnt. When brushwood is piled at the mouth of caves and set on fire, the inmates are mostly suffocated. The operation is among the recognised ones even of modern warfare. It was practised by the French in the subjection of Algeria.

they made a conscience to help themselves.] I.e. they had a conscientious scruple against defending themselves on the Sabbath. (Compare 1 Macc. ii. 32–38.)

§ 14. Remarks of the Author on the purpose of God in suffering His People to be thus persecuted.

12–17. The writer here interrupts his narrative, and interposes certain remarks on the method of God's government, in order to prevent his readers from being depressed and disheartened by his history. God, he says, allows other nations to persist in their iniquities, until they have filled up the measure of them and are the proper objects of His vengeance. With Israel He acts differently. Their transgressions He constantly corrects and chastens, before they come to a head; and so He brings them back to himself, and is never driven to destroy them, or forsake them utterly. The persecutions which he is relating were Divine chastisements with a merciful object.

12. I beseech those that read this book.] Literally, "those that happen upon this book" or "chance to meet with it."

that they judge those punishments not to be for destruction.] Rather, "that they take into account that those punishments were not for our destruction." The persecutions did not destroy Israel, but purified the nation, and raised it up to a height of glory and prosperity which it had not enjoyed for centuries.

13. wicked doers.] The "wicked doers" intended are not Epiphanes and his advisers, but the irreligious Israelites—Jason, Menelaus, and their partisans—whose impieties are viewed as having brought a general judgment upon the nation.

14. other nations . . . the Lord patiently forbeareth to punish, till they be come to the fulness of their sins.] Compare Gen. xv. 16; Dan. viii. 23. The principle was not, however, as the writer thought, one from the operation of which the Jews were exempt. They too, ultimately, "filled up the measure of their iniquities" (Matt. xxiii. 32; 1 Thess. ii. 16), and, having exhausted the patience and long-suffering of God, were dealt with penally, cast off, and "forsaken." God, however, having once chosen them to be His "peculiar people," did watch over them, chastise them, check their wanderings, recall them to the right path, with especial patience, especial tenderness. (See 2 Kings xvii. 9–23; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14–16; Is. i. 2–27.)

17. But let this . . . be for a warning unto us.] Rather, "for a reminding." Men are apt to forget the method of God's dealings with them. They need to have their hearts stirred up "by way of remembrance." This is the object which the writer has proposed to himself in his digression.

in few words.] Rather, "after brief divergence." The writer does not pretend

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

18 Eleazar, one of the principal scribes, an aged man, and of a well-favoured countenance, was constrained to open his mouth, and to eat swine's flesh.

19 But he, choosing rather to die gloriously, than to live stained with such an abomination, spit it forth, and came of his own accord to [c]the torment,

[c] Hebr. 11. 35.

20 As it behoved them to come, that are resolute to stand out against such things, as are not lawful for love of life to be tasted.

21 But they that had the charge of that wicked feast, for the old acquaintance they had with the man, taking him aside, besought him to bring flesh of his own provision, such as was lawful for him to use, and make as if he did eat of the flesh taken from the sacrifice commanded by the king;

B. C. cir. 167.

22 That in so doing he might be delivered from death, and for the old friendship with them find favour.

23 But he began to consider discreetly, and as became his age, and the excellency of his ancient years, and the honour of his gray head, whereunto he was come, and his most honest education from a child, or rather the holy law made and given by God: therefore he an-that he is about to use brevity in his coming narrative, which is remarkably diffuse.

§ 15. Account of the Martyrdom of Eleazar.

18–31. One of the simplest modes of compelling Israelites to transgress the Law, was to make them swallow unclean food; and of unclean foods the readiest at hand was the flesh of swine, which were largely used by the heathen for sacrifice and for the food of the common people. In carrying out their system of persecution, the authorities at Jerusalem required one Eleazar, an old man of ninety and one of the chief scribes, to thus pollute himself; but when the flesh was forced into his mouth, Eleazar spat it out. They then suggested privately, that he might provide himself with clean meat, and pretend to eat the swine's flesh offered him; but Eleazar rejected this proposal as an unworthy hypocrisy and as the setting of a bad example. He was accordingly martyred, being cruelly beaten to death.

18. Eleazar.] A common name among the Jews, and one certainly in use at the time, since it was borne by one of the sons of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 5)—not, as some have supposed, a fancy name, ascribed to an ideal personage. In the Hellenistic Greek "Eleazar" became "Lazarus."

one of the principal scribes.] Therefore, probably, a member of the Sanhedrin—perhaps also a priest, as stated in 4 Macc. v. 3, 34; vii. 6, 12, but certainly not "high priest," as called by Josephus Gorionides (iii. 4). A man of high station, however, on terms of intimacy with the authorities, as appears from vv. 21, 22.

an aged man.] Ninety years old (see v. 24).

of a well-favoured countenance.] The original is stronger. Translate, "of a most beautiful countenance." The face of the first Christian martyr, when he addressed the Jewish council, is said to have been "as the face of an angel" (Acts vi. 15).

19. came of his own accord to the torment.] Literally, "to the instrument of torture." What exactly was the nature and construction of the tympanum is uncertain. By v. 30 it would seem that the machine was not one which caused death, since Eleazar was killed by repeated blows of a whip or scourge.

21. they that had the charge of that wicked feast.] It would seem that, in order to carry on the persecution, a special sacrifice of swine was made, after which the Jews at hand were brought in to take part in the customary "feast upon the viscera" (σπλαγχνισμός, visceratio). The mouths of those who resisted were forced open, and the unclean meat put into them. All was done in the presence, and with the sanction, of the civil authorities. At a little distance was the "torture-instrument," on which those were placed who would not swallow the unclean food.

23. the excellency of his ancient years.] So Grimm, who quotes ch. xv. 13. But ὑπεροχὴ γήρως more naturally means "extreme advance in years," and should be so taken here; the clause καὶ τῆς τοῦ γ. ὑπεροχῆς being exegetical of the preceding τῆς ἡλικίας.

and the honour of his gray head, whereunto he was come.] This is a somewhat loose paraphrase. Nothing is said in the original about "honour." Translate—"and the conspicuous gray head whereto he had come."

or rather the holy law.] Rather, "and still more the holy legislation."

B. C. cir. 167. swered accordingly, and willed them straightways to send him to the grave.

24 For it becometh not our age, said he, in any wise to dissemble, whereby many young persons might think that Eleazar, being fourscore years old and ten, were now gone to a strange religion;

25 And so they through mine hypocrisy, and desire to live a little time and a moment longer, should be deceived by me, and I get a stain to mine old age, and make it abominable.

26 For though for the present time I should be delivered from the punishment of men: yet should I not escape the hand of the Almighty, neither alive, nor dead.

27 Wherefore now, manfully changing this life, I will shew myself such an one as mine age requireth,

28 And leave a notable example to such as be young to die willingly and courageously for the honourable and holy laws. And when he had said these words, immediately he went to the torment:

B. C. cir. 167.

29 They that led him changing the good will they bare him a little before into hatred, because the foresaid speeches proceeded, as they thought, from ‖ a desperate mind.

‖ Or, madness, or, pride.

30 But when he was ready to die with stripes, he groaned, and said, It is manifest unto the Lord, that hath the holy knowledge, that whereas I might have been delivered from death, I now endure sore pains in body by being beaten: but in soul am well content to suffer these things, because I fear him.

31 And thus this man died, leaving his death for an example of a noble courage, and a memorial of virtue, not only unto young men, but unto all his nation.

willed them.] Rather, "bade them."

24. a strange religion.] The same word as that translated "heathenish manners" in ch. iv. 13. The term is used by our author as antithetical to Ἰουδαϊσμός, and designates "the religion of the Gentiles," as Ἰουδαϊσμὸς does that of the Jews.

26. yet should I not escape the hand of the Almighty, neither alive, nor dead.] It is belief in a future life, and in the just judgment of God, that has always sustained the martyrs, both Jewish and Christian, and enabled them to set the threats of their persecutors at defiance. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews probably refers to this passage, among others, when he says—"And others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection" (Heb. xi. 35).

28. to die.] Rather, "to die a noble death." Our version fails to give any expression to the εὖ in ἀπευθανατίζειν.

29. proceeded, as they thought, from a desperate mind.] Literally, "were, as they thought, mere folly." The world always counts suffering for conscience sake to be folly. It is accepting present certain evil, in the hope of future and (as they think) very uncertain good. Christianity itself was "to the Greeks foolishness" (1 Cor. i. 23). Paul was thought by Festus to be "beside himself" (Acts xxvi. 24). The life of the good man is generally "accounted madness, and his end to be without honour" (Wisd. v. 4).

30. when he was ready to die with stripes.] Literally, "with the blows"—i. e. those which he received while stretched upon the tympanum. By the word μαστιγούμενος towards the end of the verse they would appear to have been blows from a scourge. The writer evidently regards the mode of punishment as familiar to his readers, and therefore does not describe it. Martyrdoms by scourging are mentioned in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. xi. 36).

31. leaving his death for an example.] It is as "examples" that the martyrs of this and of other times are brought forward in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where they are joined with the Christian's great example, Jesus (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

and a memorial of virtue.] "Virtue" (ἀρετή), or moral excellence—the perfection of man's moral nature, according to Greek philosophy—is not very often brought forward either in the Apocrypha or in the Canonical Scriptures as the condition at which men should endeavour to arrive. Piety (εὐσέβεια) and righteousness (δικαιοσύνη) are commonly the ends set before him. Ἀρετή, however, receives occasional acknowledgment. (See Philipp. iv. 8; 2 Pet. i. 5; Wisd. iv. 1; 2 Macc. xv. 12; 3 Macc. vi. 1, &c.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

CHAPTER VII.

The constancy and cruel death of seven brethren and their mother in one day, because they would not eat swine's flesh at the king's commandment.

IT came to pass also, that seven brethren with their mother were taken, and compelled by the king against the law to taste swine's flesh, and were tormented with scourges and whips.

2 But one of them that spake first said thus, What wouldest thou ask or learn of us? we are ready to die, rather than to transgress the laws of our fathers.

B. C. cir. 167.

3 Then the king, being in a rage, commanded pans and caldrons to be made hot:

4 Which forthwith being heated, he commanded to cut out the tongue of him that spake first, and to cut off the utmost parts of his body, the rest of his brethren and his mother looking on.

5 Now when he was thus maimed in all his members, he commanded him being yet alive to be brought to the fire, and to be fried in the pan: and as the vapour of the pan was for a good space dispersed, they exhorted one another with the mother to die manfully, saying thus,

CHAPTER VII.

§ 16. ACCOUNT OF THE MARTYRDOM OF THE SEVEN BROTHERS AND THEIR MOTHER.

1–42. The martyrdom of the seven brothers is a main subject of the Fourth Book of the Maccabees, where it occupies the chapters from ch. viii. to the end. They were known as the "All-Holy Hebdomade" (παναγία ἁδελφῶν ἑβδομάς, 4 Macc. xiv. 7), and were believed to have suffered all in one day (v. 20). The place where they suffered is uncertain. The present narrative does not fix it, excepting in so far as the presence of Epiphanes, who is said in ch. v. 25 to have returned to Antioch, may be considered to suggest the Syrian capital as the scene. The author of the Fourth Book makes them suffer at Jerusalem (ch. iv. 22; v. 1), as also does Cedrenus (vol. i. p. 223). Josephus Gorionides gives "the neighbourhood of Jerusalem" as the place (iii. 5, § 2); while John of Malala ('Chronograph.' viii. p. 206) and the Roman Martyrology distinctly say that the martyrdom was at Antioch. Our author has observed that the persecution was not confined to Judæa, but extended to the "neighbour cities of the heathen" also (ch. vi. 8). Even, however, if Antioch was the scene, it is very unlikely that Antiochus would have been present at the executions.

1. seven brethren . . . were taken.] I.e. "seized," "apprehended."

against the law.] The Jewish law of unclean meats is of course intended. (See Lev. xi. 7.)

scourges and whips.] "Scourges" (μάστιγες) were whips of cords (John ii. 15); "whips" (νευρὰ) were of untanned hide. The latter inflicted far more suffering than the former.

2. What wouldest thou ask?] "Why," i.e., "this mockery of an inquiry? What is there to learn? Habes confitentes reos. We are Jews; we admit it; and we are resolved not to transgress the Law. Put us to death at once."

3. the king . . . commanded pans and caldrons to be made hot.] The "caldrons" (λέβητες) of the present passage seem to have been the vessels that contained the fire, on the top of which were placed the "pans" (τήγανα), that these latter might be heated to a glow. The victims were placed in the "pans" (v. 5). Burning to death was a recognised Assyrian and Babylonian practice ('Records of the Past,' vol. i. p. 77; vol. ix. p. 56, &c.; Dan. iii. 6–27; Jer. xxix. 22), but seems to have been effected ordinarily by means of a furnace.

4. to cut off the utmost parts of his body.] On this punishment, see Xen. 'Anab.' i. 9, § 13; 'Beh. Inscr.' col. ii. par. 13, 14; Nic. Damasc. Fr. 132; Herodian. vi. 6. § 6; viii. 4, § 29, &c. Our translators, like the Syriac, have omitted wholly to attempt any rendering of the participle περισκυθίσαντες, which must certainly designate some other distinct cruelty. It probably means "scalping," or "removing the scalp"—a noted Scythian practice (Herod. iv. 64; Plin. 'H. N.' vii. 11; Hesych. ad voc. Σκυθιστὶ χειρόμακτρον). The Vulgate gives "cute capitis abstracta."

5. as the vapour of the pan was for a good space dispersed.] The meaning seems to be, that the scent of the roasting flesh extended to a considerable distance, reaching the spot where the mother and her other children stood. So the Syriac Version, and Dean Stanley ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 299, note [1]), who parallels the remark with the jests of St. Lawrence in the martyrologies.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 167.

6 The Lord God looketh upon us, and in truth hath comfort in us, as [a] Moses in his song, which witnessed to their faces, declared, saying, And he shall be comforted in his servants.

[a] Deut. 32. 36.

7 So when the first was dead after this manner, they brought the second to make him a mocking stock: and when they had pulled off the skin of his head with the hair, they asked him, Wilt thou eat, before thou be punished throughout every member of thy body?

8 But he answered in his own language, and said, No. Wherefore he also received the next torment in order, as the former did.

9 And when he was at the last gasp, he said, Thou like a fury takest us out of this present life, but the King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life.

B. C. cir. 167.

10 After him was the third made a mocking stock: and when he was required, he put out his tongue, and that right soon, holding forth his hands manfully, 11 And said courageously, These I had from heaven; and for his laws I despise them; and from him I hope to receive them again.

12 Insomuch that the king, and they that were with him, marvelled

6. The Lord God looketh upon us.] Rather, "the Lord God keepeth watch"—has an eye, not only over us, but over all things. The expression is quite general.

hath comfort in us.] Rather, "is compassionate towards us," according to the general meaning of the phrase. (See Deut. xxxii. 36; Ps. xc. 13, cxxxv. 14.)

Moses in his song, which witnessed to their faces.] Rather, "which witnessed against them to their faces" (τῆς ἀντιμαρτυρούσης ᾠδῆς). The reference is to vv. 15–33 of the "Song," where Moses reproaches the Israelites with their unfaithfulness.

saying, And he shall be comforted in his servants.] Our version of the "Song" gives —"and repent himself for his servants" (Deut. xxxii. 36).

7. to make him a mocking stock.] Compare Heb. xi. 36, "and others had trials of cruel mockings and scourgings;" and for the practice of mocking an accused person before executing him, see Matt. xxvii. 29, 30; Mark xv. 20, 31; Luke xxiii. 11, 36.

when they had pulled off the skin of his head with the hair.] A variant mode of describing the operation of scalping. Compare v. 4, and the comment ad loc.

Wilt thou eat?] Supply "swine's flesh" from v. 1.

before thou be punished throughout every member of thy body.] As the first brother had been punished. (See vv. 4 and 5.)

8. he answered in his own language.] I.e. in the Syriac of the time, which the executioners would understand well enough, though Antiochus, as seems to be implied below (v. 24), might not, as a Greek, be familiar with any other language than his own.

9. Thou like a fury.] Rather, "Thou, O wicked one." An ἀλάστωρ is a man who does deeds of wickedness that cannot be forgotten (ὁ ἄλαστα δεδρακώς). The word is rarely found in prose, but is common with the tragedians. (See Æsch. 'Ag.' 1482; 'Eum.' 227; 'Suppl.' 410; 'Pers.' 256;—Soph. 'Œd. Col.' 788; 'Aj.' 372;—Eurip. 'Hec.' 675, 949; 'Phœn.' 1556, &c.)

shall raise us up . . . unto everlasting life.] See the comment on ch. vi. 26. As that passage alludes to the punishment after death of those who offend God, so the present brings forward with great distinctness the happiness enjoyed after death by those who have remained faithful to Him. Whatever obscurity had hung about the doctrine of a future life and future rewards and punishments, during the earlier period of the Mosaic dispensation, it is clear that at this time there was a firm belief in them among all the religious part of the nation. (See vv. 11, 14, 23, 29, 36; and compare ch. xii. 43–45, xiv. 46.)

10. After him was the third made a mocking stock.] See the comment on v. 7.

11. These I had from heaven.] I.e. they were given to me by God at my birth. His hands "made me and fashioned me" (Job x. 8). "In his book were all my members written; which day by day were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them" (Ps. cxxxix. 16).

from him I hope to receive them again.] Here we have belief in the resurrection of the body expressed. This doctrine is perhaps scarcely taught in Job xix. 25–27, where some have thought to find it; but it appears distinctly in Daniel (xii. 2) and Ezekiel (xxxvii. 1–14), and seems to have been the general belief of the Jews after the return from the Captivity.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167. at the young man's courage, for that he nothing regarded the pains.

13 Now when this man was dead also, they tormented and mangled the fourth in like manner.

14 So when he was ready to die he said thus, It is good, being put to death by men, to look for hope from God to be raised up again by him: as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life.

15 Afterward they brought the fifth also, and mangled him.

16 Then looked he unto the king, and said, Thou hast power over men, thou art corruptible, thou doest what thou wilt; yet think not that our nation is forsaken of God;

17 But abide a while, and behold his great power, how he will torment thee and thy seed.

18 After him also they brought the sixth, who being ready to die said, Be not deceived without cause: for we suffer these things for ourselves, having sinned against our God: therefore marvellous things are done unto us. B. C. cir. 167.

19 But think not thou, that takest in hand to strive against God, that thou shalt escape unpunished.

20 But the mother was marvellous above all, and worthy of honourable memory: for when she saw her seven sons slain within the space of one day, she bare it with a good courage, because of the hope that she had in the Lord.

21 Yea, she exhorted every one of them in her own language, filled with courageous spirits; and stirring up her womanish thoughts with a manly stomach, she said unto them,

12. the king.] Rather, "the king himself."

14. when he was ready to die.] Or, "at the point of death."

to look for hope from God to be raised up again by him.] It was distinctly recognised by the Jews that there could be no natural resurrection. The "dead bones" could not "live," unless through some miraculous exertion of Divine power upon them. Consequently each Jew looked to be raised up to a new life after death by a distinct act of Omnipotence performed for his individual benefit.

as for thee.] The denunciations of their persecutor by the martyrs, here and in vv. 17, 19, 31, 35–37, are such as Christian martyrs have been taught by their Lord not to utter (Matt. v. 44; Luke xxiii. 34). They are, however, such as the brutal conduct of Antiochus well deserved, and such as human nature instinctively utters, unless subdued and perfected by grace. Compare the denunciations of the Psalms (Ps. xxxv. 4; xl. 14, 15; lv. 15; lix. 10–13; &c.).

16. Thou hast power . . . thou art corruptible . . . thou doest.] The nexus of the clauses is lost by this interpretation. Translate—"Thou that art corruptible, yet hast power over men, doest what thou wilt." The point of the reproach is, that, being a frail perishing mortal, entrusted with power over men, he should suppose himself at liberty to treat them according to his mere will and pleasure. Compare John xix. 11, where our Lord suggests to Pilate his responsibility for the use of a "power given to him from above."

17. abide a while.] Literally, "Be patient;" i.e. "Do not be in a hurry to judge: wait, and see the result."

how he will torment thee and thy seed.] Compare ch. ix. 5–28; xiv. 2. The speaker does not claim the prophetic gift, but utters his threat upon the general conviction that God will punish evil-doers, and their seed after them. (Compare Ex. xx. 5, xxxiv. 7; Lev. xxvi. 39, &c.)

18. being ready to die.] Rather, "when he was about to die."

for ourselves.] Rather, "on our own account"—because we have sinned, and God is punishing us in this life, to purify us and make us fit for the life which is to come in heaven. (See ch. vi. 13.)

20. the mother was marvellous above all.] First, as a woman, whereas the rest were men and might be expected to bear pain and death; secondly, as subjected to worse suffering than the others, since there is no such agony as that felt by a mother who sees her children tortured and slain. But the crowning marvellousness is no doubt that related in vv. 24–29—the mother exhorting her youngest not to accept the offer of his life and of the royal favour, but to die nobly like his brethren.

21. in her own language.] See the comment on v. 8.

stirring up her womanish thoughts with a

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

22 I cannot tell how ye came into my womb; for I neither gave you breath nor life, neither was it I that formed the members of every one of you;

23 But doubtless the Creator of the world, who formed the generation of man, and found out the beginning of all things, will also of his own mercy give you breath and life again, as ye now regard not your own selves for his laws' sake.

24 Now Antiochus, thinking himself despised, and suspecting it to be a reproachful speech, whilst the youngest was yet alive, did not only exhort him by words, but also assured him with oaths, that he would make him both a rich and a happy man, if he would turn from the laws of his fathers; and that also he would take him for his friend, and trust him with affairs.

B. C. cir. 167.

25 But when the young man would in no case hearken unto him, the king called his mother, and exhorted her that she would counsel the young man to save his life.

26 And when he had exhorted her with many words, she promised him that she would counsel her son.

27 But she bowing herself toward manly stomach.] Gregory Nazianzen says she had the soul of a man in the body of a woman ('Hom. in Macc.' p. 399). The language is perhaps rather conventional, than in accordance with the facts of human nature, since in enduring pain women have at all times exhibited at least equal courage with men, and the martyrologies shew as many female names as male.

22. I cannot tell how ye came into my womb.] Compare Eccles. xi. 5. Conception, generation, growth, have always been mysteries, and remain such, despite of vivisection and the microscope. The formation of human beings in the womb is fairly paralleled with their re-formation after death and dissolution have taken place. Each is a Divine work, and requires Divine power and Divine knowledge for its accomplishment. God's ability to effect the one may well encourage us to believe that He can effect the other. This is the mother's argument.

I neither gave you breath nor life.] The most earnest wishes, the greatest care, on the part of the mother will not secure the child's being born alive. God alone gives the life, the vital principle, the soul, or whatever we choose to call it, the germ of personality and of an undying existence.

nor was it I that formed the members.] Compare Job x. 8–12: "Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about . . . thou hast made me as the clay . . . thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews. Thou hast granted me life and favour," &c. See also Ps. cxxxix. 13–16.

23. the Creator . . . who formed the generation of man.] See Gen. i. 26, 27; ii. 7, 18–22.

and found out the beginning of all things.] I.e. who determined after deep thought the constitution of the universe. Compare Eph. i. 11, "Who worketh all things after the counsel of his will."

of his own mercy.] Rather, "of his mercy." There is no epithet to ἔλεος.

24. Antiochus . . . suspecting it to be a reproachful speech.] Rather, "suspecting the tone of reproach in which she spoke." Antiochus could not understand what the woman said, as he did not know Syriac; but he caught the tone of the speech (τὴν φωνήν), which sounded like one of reproach; and this made him suspicious of the tenor of her words.

he would take him for his friend.] On the position of "king's friend" at the Syrian Court, see the comment on 1 Macc. ii. 18, where the offer here made is repeated to Mattathias.

25. in no case.] Rather, "in no wise."

the king . . . exhorted her.] Either the mother is to be regarded as understanding Greek, or Antiochus as having spoken to her through an interpreter.

26. she promised him that she would counsel her son.] Literally, "that she would persuade her son." The king, no doubt, understood this to mean, that she would persuade him to accept his offer; but the mother only meant that she would use her influence with him, and persuade him to do what she thought right.

27. bowing herself toward him.] I.e. leaning towards him, so as to bring herself nearer, and to give her words greater effect. The touch is most graphic and affecting. She was afraid that her youngest, probably a mere boy, might yield, and so tarnish the glory of her race, and at the same time become eternally lost to her (v. 29).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167. him, laughing the cruel tyrant to scorn, spake in her country language on this manner; O my son, have pity upon me that bare thee nine months in my womb, and gave thee suck three years, and nourished thee, and brought thee up unto this age, and endured the troubles of education.

28 I beseech thee, my son, look upon the heaven and the earth, and all that is therein, and consider that [b] God made them of things that were not; and so was mankind made likewise.

[b] Rem. 4. 17.

29 Fear not this tormentor, but, being worthy of thy brethren, take thy death, that I may receive thee again in mercy with thy brethren.

B. C. cir. 167.

30 Whiles she was yet speaking these words, the young man said, Whom wait ye for? I will not obey the king's commandment: but I will obey the commandment of the law that was given unto our fathers by Moses.

31 And thou, that hast been the author of all mischief against the Hebrews, shalt not escape the hands of God.

32 For we suffer because of our sins.

laughing the cruel tyrant to scorn.] Rather, "passing a cheat on the cruel tyrant"—i.e. making him think she was persuading her son to accept his offer, when she was doing the opposite.

that bare thee.] Literally, "that carried thee about."

and gave thee suck three years.] Compare 2 Chr. xxxi. 16, where we find that the children of the priests had no daily portion of food assigned them until they were three years old. Children are still suckled in the East for three, or even four, years.

and endured the troubles of education.] Rather, "and did thy nursing." Compare Deut. i. xxxi; and Acts xiii. 18 (according to one reading). The word points to the tendance of a nurse, not to "education" in our sense of the term.

28. consider that God made them of things that were not.] Ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων. Compare Heb. xi. 3: "Things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." The creation of the universe out of nothing, which was an idea never reached by heathen philosophy, seems to have been from the first the conception of the Hebrews. No pre-existent matter is spoken of in Genesis, where God makes all things by a mere word. Compare the declaration of the Psalmist, "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth" (Ps. xxxiii. 6). Contact with Greek philosophy at Alexandria modified the Hebrew view; and we find the author of the Book of Wisdom declaring, quite in the language of a Platonist, that God's "almighty hand made the world out of matter without form" (ἐξ ὕλης ἀμόρφου). Compare Plat. 'Tim.' p. 30, A; and Tim. Locr. § 1.

and so was mankind made likewise.] This is not altogether true. "God formed man of the dust of the ground" (Gen. ii. 7), and formed woman out of man (ib. vv. 21, 22). But he had previously formed the dust of the ground out of nothing.

29. this tormentor.] Or, "this hangman." The word employed is the usual one for the common executioner. It is a term, not merely of vituperation, but of insult.

that I may receive thee again.] The mother expects to meet her sons again in the other world, and to hold still the relation of a mother towards them.

30. Whiles she was yet speaking.] Some MSS. have καταληγούσης, which would mean "as she was leaving off;" and Grimm prefers this reading; but it does not suit the preceding ἔτι, "yet." We can say, "while she was yet speaking," but not "while she was yet leaving off." The Vulgate, the Syriac, and Joseph. Gorion. (iii. 6), confirm the received text.

I will not obey.] Literally, "I obey not"—i.e. "I decide not to obey."

31. the author of all mischief.] Literally, "the inventor of all evil." Compare Rom. i. 30. Jason, Menelaus, and others had no doubt been the original conceivers of much of the "mischief;" but nothing could have been done except by command of Antiochus. On him therefore the responsibility rested.

against the Hebrews.] The old ethnic name, "Hebrews" (Ex. ii. 13), which had fallen out of use for many centuries, was revived in the course of the second century B.C., and came to be regarded as a title of honour. (See 2 Macc. xi. 13, xv. 37; 4 Macc. iv. 11, v. 1, viii. 2, &c.; Acts vi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Philipp. iii. 5.) It has not, however, any special force in this place.

32. we suffer because of our sins.] Compare v. 18.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 167.

33 And though the living God be angry with us a little while for our chastening and correction, yet shall he be at one again with his servants.

34 But thou, O godless man, and of all other most wicked, be not lifted up without a cause, nor puffed up with uncertain hopes, lifting up thy hand against the servants of God:

35 For thou hast not yet escaped the judgment of Almighty God, who seeth all things.

36 For our brethren, who now have suffered a short pain, are dead under God's covenant of everlasting life: but thou, through the judgment of God, shalt receive just punishment for thy pride.

37 But I, as my brethren, offer up my body and life for the laws of our fathers, beseeching God that he would speedily be merciful unto our nation; and that [c] thou by torments and plagues mayest confess, that he alone is God;

B. C. cir. 167.

38 And that in me and my brethren the wrath of the Almighty, which is justly brought upon all our nation, may cease.

39 Then the king, being in a rage, handled him worse than all the rest, and took it grievously that he was mocked.

40 So this man died undefiled, and put his whole trust in the Lord.

41 Last of all after the sons the mother died.

42 Let this be enough now to have spoken concerning the idolatrous feasts, and the extreme tortures.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Judas gathereth an host. 9 Nicanor is sent against him: who presumeth to make much money of his prisoners. 16 Judas encourageth his men, and putteth Nicanor to flight, 28 and divideth the spoils. 30 Other enemies are also defeated, 35 and Nicanor fleeth with grief to Antioch.

[c] 2 Macc. 6. 13. ch. 9. 12, &c.

34. puffed up with uncertain hopes.] The vain hope of forcing Hellenism on the whole Jewish nation, and inducing them to renounce their own religion.

35. who seeth all things.] Rather, "who keepeth a watch"—i.e. who has an eye on men and their doings (ἐπόπτης, not παντόπτης).

36. God's covenant of everlasting life.] It is not easy to see how, anterior to Christianity, God could be said to have entered into covenant with man, to give him "everlasting life." Daniel had declared that, of those who slept in the dust of the earth, some should "awake to eternal life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (ch. xii. 2); but the declaration was in no way a "covenant." David, it is true, had spiritualised the idea of Canaan, and spoken of an entrance into rest as guaranteed to true Israelites, which was still future in his day (Ps. xcv. 8–11; Heb. iii. 7–19, iv. 5–9). But this was far short of a covenant to give eternal life. Perhaps the covenant was regarded as anterior to revelation, and implied in man's moral nature. Perhaps no very definite account could have been given of it, even by those with whom it was an article of faith.

37. that thou by torments and plagues mayest confess, that he alone is God.] The "torments and plagues," which the writer believes Antiochus to have suffered, are set forth in ch. ix. 5–11; the confession, which he supposes him to have made, in ch. ix. 12–17. Of these, the latter seems to be an invention (see 1 Macc. vi. 11–13), while the former are much exaggerated (ibid. 8–10).

39. and took it grievously.] Rather, "since he took it grievously." The author assigns this as the reason of his rage, and of his excessive cruelty towards the youngest of the brothers.

40. and put his whole trust, &c.] It would be better to translate — "trusting wholly in the Lord." The trust was before, and at the time of, death.

42. Let this be enough now to have spoken.] Compare the summaries in ch. iii. 40, x. 9, xiii. 26, and xv. 38, 39. It is the author's habit to end each portion of his work with a sort of summary or recapitulation.

CHAPTER VIII.

PART III.

THE WAR OF JUDAS MACCABÆUS WITH ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

§ 1. THE BEGINNINGS OF MACCABÆUS. PHILIP'S APPLICATION TO PTOLEMÆUS, GOVERNOR OF CŒLESYRIA.

1–8. The writer had told us (ch. v. 27), that Judas Maccabæus, with about nine

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166. THEN Judas Maccabeus, and they that were with him, went privily into the towns, and called their kinsfolks together, and took unto them all such as continued in the Jews' religion, and assembled about six thousand men.

2 And they called upon the Lord, that he would look upon the people that was trodden down of all; and also pity the temple profaned of ungodly men;

3 And that he would have compassion upon the city, sore defaced, and ready to be made even with the ground; and hear the blood that cried unto him, B. C. cir. 166.

4 And remember the wicked slaughter of harmless infants, and the blasphemies committed against his name; and that he would shew his hatred against the wicked.

5 Now when Maccabeus had his company about him, he could not be withstood by the heathen: for the wrath of the Lord was turned into mercy.

others, withdrew himself from Jerusalem, soon after the cruel massacre of unarmed Jews in the streets of Jerusalem by Apollonius (ibid. v. 26). He now resumes his account of this hero and his marvellous doings, occupying with them the remainder of his treatise, but dividing them into three portions, corresponding to the three reigns of Antiochus Epiphanes, Antiochus Eupator, and Demetrius Soter. Here he relates how Judas, having collected about six thousand men, and made solemn prayer to God, began a series of offensive operations, chiefly by night, and thus got into his hands many of the Judæan towns, and gained several victories over the king's troops. At last, Philip, the commandant of Jerusalem, finding himself overmatched, applied to Ptolemy, governor of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia, for aid, and begged him to interpose in the war, which was going against the interests of the king.

1. they that were with him.] The little knot of nine or ten friends, who, according to our author, had withdrawn with him from Jerusalem. We know from 1 Macc. ii. 27–48 that the first army was in reality collected, and the first battles fought, by Mattathias, whom the author of the Second Book wholly ignores.

about six thousand men.] According to the author of the first book, Judas had no more than 3000 men in his contest with Gorgias and Nicanor (1 Macc. iv. 6). Against Lysias he mustered 10,000 (ibid. v. 29). The estimate of numbers with Orientals is always vague and uncertain.

2. they called upon the Lord.] On the strong devotional spirit that animated Judas, see 1 Macc. iii. 18–22, 46–60; iv. 8–11, 24, 30–33, 36–59; ix. 10. The present passage (vv. 2–4) is quite in accordance with those above quoted, and adds the further fact, that his army was animated by much the same spirit as himself, and "continued calling upon God" (ἐπεκαλοῦντο τὸν Κύριον) day by day and hour by hour.

that was trodden down of all.] Trampled upon by Syrians, Phrygians (ch. v. 22), and renegade Jews, the last the worst enemies of God's faithful people.

the temple profaned of ungodly men.] See ch. v. 15–21, vi. 2–5; and compare 1 Macc. i. 21–59, iii. 45. If the profanation described in ch. vi. 4 continued, we can well understand the horror of all pious Jews, and their earnest prayers that such pollutions might cease.

3. the city, sore defaced, and ready to be made even with the ground.] Apollonius had "set the city on fire, and pulled down the houses and walls thereof on every side" (1 Macc. i. 31).

the blood that cried unto him.] I.e. the blood of the 80,000 slain by Antiochus himself (ch. v. 14), of the 22,000 slaughtered by Apollonius (ibid. v. 24), and of all the later martyrs (ch. vi. 10–31). Innocent blood, shed by man, cries to God for vengeance (Gen. iv. 10; Rev. vi. 10).

4. the wicked slaughter of harmless infants.] See 1 Macc. i. 61; 2 Macc. vi. 10.

the blasphemies committed.] As calling the temple of Jehovah that of Jupiter Olympius (ch. vi. 2). Impious deeds, however, seem to have been regarded as "blasphemies," no less than impious words. (See the comment on ch. ii. 6.)

that he would shew his hatred against the wicked.] Literally, "that he would hate wickedness." But the translation does not ill express the meaning of the writer.

5. his company.] I.e. his army of 6,000 men (see v. 1).

he could not be withstood.] See 1 Macc. iii. 10–26.

the wrath of the Lord was turned into mercy.] The prayers of the seven brethren had been heard (Grimm). The tide had turned. The fortunes of Israel were once more in the ascendant. Instead of a nation

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166.

6 Therefore he came at unawares, and burnt up towns and cities, and got into his hands the most commodious places, and overcame and put to flight no small number of his enemies.

7 But specially took he advantage of the night for such privy attempts, insomuch that the bruit of his manliness was spread every where.

8 So when Philip saw that this man increased by little and little, and that things prospered with him still more and more, he wrote unto Ptolemeus, the governor of Celosyria and Phenice, to yield more aid to the king's affairs.

B. C. cir. 166.

9 Then forthwith choosing Nicanor the son of Patroclus, one of his special friends, he sent him with no crushed beneath the heel of the oppressor, there was now to be seen a nucleus of patriots, determined on resisting the tyrant to the uttermost, and on maintaining at once the national religion and the separate national existence. Uninterrupted success attended the early efforts of this party under the leadership of Judas.

6. at unawares.] His first successes were a series of surprises. He suddenly appeared before towns and villages which did not expect him, besieged, stormed, and burnt them. His attacks were chiefly made by night (see v. 7).

and got into his hands . . . and overcame.] Rather, "and by getting into his hands the most commodious places, he overcame," &c. The seizure of important posts is represented as the cause of his victories.

7. specially took he advantage of the night.] Night attacks are regarded by the Orientals as especially dangerous, and are very seldom adventured on. A leader whose attacks were systematically made by night would in the East soon acquire a reputation for extraordinary daring.

8. So when Philip saw.] "Philip the Phrygian" was the Syro-Macedonian governor of Jerusalem, whom Antiochus had left there when he withdrew to Antioch (ch. v. 22). His continuance in the office is implied in ch. vi. 11.

he wrote unto Ptolemeus.] The name Ptolemy was very common at the time, and causes much confusion; but the Ptolemy here intended is probably the son of Dorymenes, already mentioned by the author as high in the favour of Antiochus (ch. iv. 45, 46), and coupled with Nicanor and Gorgias by the writer of the First Book (1 Macc. iii. 38). For the antecedents of this Ptolemy, see the comment on the last-quoted passage.

the governor of Celosyria and Phenice.] Apollonius had ceased to hold that office (ch. iii. 5, iv. 4, v. 24, compared with 1 Macc. i. 29, iii. 10–12), apparently before his death, and had been replaced by Ptolemy.

§ 2. The Expedition of Nicanor and Gorgias against Judas. Victory of Judas. His solemn Thanksgiving and Prayer.

9–29. This passage has to be compared with 1 Macc. iii. 38–60, iv. 1–25, which relates to the same occurrences. The chief differences between the two accounts are—(1.) That in 1 Macc. Lysias is made to conceive the expedition, while Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias are entrusted with its execution; but in 2 Macc. Ptolemy forms the plan and assigns its execution to the two others. (2.) In 1 Macc. Gorgias appears as the actual commander, while Nicanor is barely mentioned; in 2 Macc. the position of the two is reversed. (3.) The writer of 1 Macc. estimates the Syro-Macedonian forces at 47,000 (ch. iii. 39); those under Judas at 3,000 (ch. iv. 6), while our author makes the respective numbers 20,000 (v. 9) and 6,000 (v. 16). On the other hand, the number of the slain on the Syro-Macedonian side, which is but 3,000 in 1 Macc. iv. 15, is raised to 9,000 in 2 Macc. viii. 24. (4.) The account in 1 Macc. goes into much greater detail than that in 2 Macc. with respect to the movements on either side, military and other; while 2 Macc. adds an interesting feature in the division of his forces made by Judas (v. 22), and another in the part assigned to Eleazar (v. 23). (5.) The account of Judas's march on Jerusalem and return to Emmaus is peculiar to 1 Macc. (ch. iii. 46–57), while the accounts of his speech immediately before the battle (2 Macc. viii. 16–20) and his thanksgiving afterwards (ibid. vv. 27–29) are given at length only in 2 Macc. Altogether the two accounts have little that is contradictory except the numbers, and help to fill out each other.

9. Then forthwith choosing.] Rather, "And he (i.e. Ptolemy) forthwith choosing," &c. Ewald says that our author regards Philip as appointing these officers ('Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 310, note [1]); but this is incorrect. The pronoun ὁ can only refer to the latest antecedent, Ptolemy.

Nicanor the son of Patroclus.] See 1 Macc.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166. fewer than twenty thousand of all nations under him, to root out the whole generation of the Jews; and with him he joined also Gorgias a captain, who in matters of war had great experience.

10 So Nicanor undertook to make so much money of [a]the captive Jews, as should defray the tribute of two thousand talents, which the king was to pay to the Romans.

[a] 1 Mac. 3. 41. ver. 25, 34.

11 Wherefore immediately he sent to the cities upon the sea coast, proclaiming a sale of the captive Jews, and promising that they should have fourscore and ten bodies for one talent, not expecting the vengeance that was to follow upon him from the Almighty God.

B. C. cir. 166.

12 Now when word was brought unto Judas of Nicanor's coming, and he had imparted unto those that were with him that the army was at hand, 13 [b]They that were fearful, and distrusted the justice of God, fled, and conveyed themselves away.

[b] 1 Mac. 3. 56.

14 Others sold all that they had left, and withal besought the Lord to deliver them, being sold by the wicked Nicanor before they met together:

15 And if not for their own sakes, yet for the covenants he had made with their fathers, and for his holy

iii. 38, and Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, § 3. It is probable, though not quite certain, that this is the same Nicanor who made the expeditions against Judæa of which an account is given by our author in chs. xiv. and xv.

no fewer than twenty thousand.] Forty-seven thousand, according to 1 Macc. (iii. 39) and Josephus (l. s. c.). Ewald accepts the larger number.

to root out the whole generation of the Jews.] Rather, "the whole race." Compare 1 Macc. iii. 35, 36, where this design is distinctly ascribed to Antiochus himself.

with him he joined also Gorgias.] See 1 Macc. iii. 38; iv. 1, 5, 18; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, §§ 3, 4.

10. Nicanor undertook.] Rather, "determined." It is represented as his own idea that he should raise the money wanted for the tribute by the sale of Jewish slaves. Note that the writer of the First Book knows nothing of this proposed application of the money, and that Roman history knows nothing of any "tribute" due at this time to Rome from Antiochus. Syria was not tributary to Rome; and the last instalment of the indemnity to which Antiochus the Great became liable after the battle of Magnesia, was paid by Epiphanes in B.C. 173 (Liv. xlii. 6), eight years before this expedition of Nicanor's.

11. the cities upon the sea coast.] The Phœnician cities especially, which profited largely by the sale of slaves (Ezek. xxvii. 13).

fourscore and ten bodies for one talent.] Slaves were called "bodies" in the later Greek, being regarded materially, as mere live implements (ἔμψυχα ὄργανα, Arist. 'Pol.' i. 2). Ninety slaves for a talent was an extraordinarily low price, when all classes of slaves were to be included; since it was very little above the lowest current rate. That, according to Xenophon ('Mem.' ii. 5, § 2), was half a mina (2*l.*). Captives in war were ordinarily redeemable at a mina (Arist. 'Eth. Nic.' v. 6, § 1). Strong and capable slaves fetched commonly ten minæ (40*l.*); superior ones sometimes fetched a talent (240*l.*). The rate established by Nicanor made the price of a slave two-thirds of a mina (2*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*). He must have expected to sell 180,000, in order to obtain the 2000 talents which he intended to raise. On the flocking of the slave-merchants to the Syrian camp on the occasion, see 1 Macc. iii. 41.

13. They that were fearful . . . fled.] The author of the First Book says that Judas issued an order that all those who were afraid should disperse to their homes (1 Macc. iii. 56).

14. Others sold all that they had left.] Rather, "the others," or "the remainder." The fact is unnoticed by the writer of the First Book, and may perhaps be doubted. It is not very clear what fugitives like those who formed the army of Judas (1 Macc. iii. 43, 44) would have to sell, or to whom they could sell, unless it were one to another.

before they met together.] Rather, "before he fell in with them," or "before he joined battle with them." Nicanor had as good as sold them; i.e. he had arranged for their price, and invited their purchasers into his camp, before he had even so much as met them in the field.

15. for the covenants he had made with their fathers.] As with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (see ch. i. 2), and again with the whole nation in the wilderness (Ex. xix. 5–8; xxiv. 3–8; xxxiv. 10).

and for his holy and glorious name's sake,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166. and glorious name's sake, by which they were called.

16 So Maccabeus called his men together unto the number of six [c] 1 Mac. 4. 8. thousand, and exhorted them [c]not to be stricken with terror of the enemy, nor to fear the great multitude of the heathen, who came wrongfully against them; but to fight manfully,

17 And to set before their eyes the injury that they had unjustly done to the holy place, and the cruel handling of the city, whereof they made a mockery, and also the taking away of the government of their forefathers:

18 For they, said he, trust in their weapons and boldness; but our confidence is in the Almighty God, who at a beck can cast down both them that come against us, and also all the world. B. C. cir. 166.

19 Moreover he recounted unto them what helps their forefathers had found, and [d]how they were delivered, [d] 1 Mac. 7. 41. when under Sennacherib an hundred ch. 15. 22. fourscore and five thousand perished.

20 And he told them of the battle that they had in Babylon with the Galatians, how they came but eight thousand in all to the business, with four thousand Macedonians, and that the Macedonians being perplexed, the eight thousand destroyed an hundred and twenty thousand because of the help that they had from heaven, and so received a great booty.

by which they were called.] Rather, "and because of their being called by his holy and glorious name." Because, i.e., they were known as "the people of God" (Ex. xxxiii. 13; Deut. ix. 26, &c.), and their destruction, at which Nicanor aimed, would have been a sort of dishonour to God himself.

16. unto the number of six thousand.] The writer seems to have forgotten what he had said, of many having "fled and conveyed themselves away" (v. 13). He makes the number of Judas's army, after this defection, exactly the same as before it. (See v. 1.) The writer of the First Book, on the contrary, makes the armed men who remained with Judas no more than 3,000 (1 Macc. iv. 6), and Josephus agrees with this estimate ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, § 4).

nor to fear the great multitude.] Compare 1 Macc. iv. 8.

17. the injury . . . unjustly done to the holy place.] See above, ch. vi. 2–5.

the cruel handling of the city, whereof they made a mockery.] The inhabitants of the city, rather than the city itself, seem to be here intended, and the reference to be to the "cruel handling" and "mocking" of the martyrs. (See ch. vii. 7, 10, 13, &c.)

the taking away of the government of their forefathers.] The appointment of Philip the Phrygian as Syro-Macedonian governor of Jerusalem (ch. v. 22), and the sending of royal commissioners from Antioch with unlimited powers (ch. vi. 1), were infringements of the terms on which the Jews had become subjects of the Syro-Macedonian kingdom, and amounted to an abolition (κατάλυσις) of their ancestral government. Under the new system, the High Priest was a mere puppet in the hands of the Syro-Macedonian governor.

19. Moreover he recounted unto them what helps their forefathers had found.] The writer of the First Book makes his sole historic reference to be to the deliverance of Israel from the Egyptians at the Red Sea (ch. iv. 9). This our present author omits, while bringing forward two other great deliverances.

under Sennacherib.] See 2 Kings xix. 35; and compare 1 Macc. vii. 41.

20. the battle that they had in Babylon with the Galatians.] Rather, "in Babylonia." Nothing more is known of this engagement. Galatian troops were widely employed as mercenaries by the Asiatic kings for some time after the great Galatian inroad into Asia Minor in the third century B.C. (Justin. xxv. 2, § 10), and are said to have fought on both sides in the war of Antiochus the Great with Molo. As Babylon was in fact the scene of this struggle, it is conjectured that Judas alludes to some episode of the contest, not elsewhere mentioned, in which the Jews who served under Antiochus had gained a victory over a large body of Galatians in the service of Molo (Grimm).

with four thousand Macedonians.] I.e. "Syro-Macedonians"—Greek subjects of the Seleucidæ.

the eight thousand destroyed an hundred and twenty thousand.] Here there is probably a great exaggeration. The Galatians, in the height of their prosperity, never brought into the field more than about 20,000 warriors (Liv. xxxviii. 16). Moreover, the number of mercenaries in the service of any single Asiatic king is not found to have exceeded 8,000.

and so received a great booty.] Literally,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166.

21 Thus when he had made them bold with these words, and ready to die for the laws and the country, he divided his army into four parts;

22 And joined with himself his own brethren, leaders of each band, to wit, Simon, and Joseph, and Jonathan, giving each one fifteen hundred men.

23 Also he appointed Eleazar to read the holy book: and when he had given them this watchword, The help of God; himself leading the first band, he joined battle with Nicanor.

24 And by the help of the Almighty they slew above nine thousand of their enemies, and wounded and maimed the most part of Nicanor's host, and so put all to flight;

B. C. cir. 165.

25 And took [e]their money that came to buy them, and pursued them far: but lacking time they returned:

[e] ver. 10, 11, 34.

26 For it was the day before the sabbath, and therefore they would no longer pursue them.

27 So when they had gathered [‖]their armour together, and spoiled their enemies, they occupied them-

[‖] That is, the enemies' armour.

"great advantage." The nature of the advantage is not stated.

21. he divided his army into four parts.] Literally, "He made a sort of fourfold division of his army." It is not meant that he made an actual separation of his men, and sent some to fight in one place and some in another, as was done by his adversaries (1 Macc. iv. 1–7), but only that he enrolled his soldiers in four regiments, each under its own leader. The leaders were himself and three of his brothers, Simon, John, and Jonathan.

22. Joseph.] This "Joseph" is clearly the brother called John by the author of the First Book (ch. ii. 2; ix. 36, 38). It is not, however, a wrong reading, or even a mere slip of the pen on the part of the writer, but probably an actual mistake. He repeats the error in ch. x. 19.

giving each one fifteen hundred men.] This statement assumes that the total number was 6,000, as stated in v. 16. If it was really no more than 3,000, we must regard the "regiments" as consisting each of 750 men.

23. Also he appointed Eleazar to read the holy book.] The existing Greek text is ungrammatical, and cannot be said to have any clear and distinct meaning. It seems necessary to change παραγνοὺς into παραγνῶναι, in order to obtain anything like a satisfactory sense. We may then supply ἔταξε from the τάξας at the beginning of v. 22, and translate as in the English Version. The δοὺς of the second clause probably misled the copyists.

this watchword, The help of God.] Compare ch. xiii. 15. On the practice of giving a watchword to an army about to engage in battle, see Xen. 'Anab.' i. 8, § 17; 'Cyrop.' iii. 3, § 58; vii. 1, § 10; Appian, 'Bell. Civ.' ii. 76; Veget. 'De Re Mil.' iii. 3, &c.

himself leading the first band.] I.e. the first of the four regiments into which he had divided his army (v. 21).

he joined battle with Nicanor.] Nicanor, it appears, was in command of the main body of Syro-Macedonian troops encamped at Emmaus, which Judas attacked, after Gorgias had been sent with five thousand men into the hill-country to attack him (1 Macc. iv. 1–14).

24. they slew above nine thousand.] The slain are reckoned by the writer of the First Book as "upon a three thousand" (ch. iv. 15). So also Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, § 4). The probability is in favour of the smaller number.

and wounded and maimed the most part of Nicanor's host.] Another exaggeration. If 3,000 were killed, it is not likely that more than 6,000 were wounded. But Nicanor's host had numbered twenty thousand, according to our author (v. 9); forty-seven thousand, according to the writer of the First Book (1 Macc. iii. 39).

25. And took their money that came to buy them.] See above, v. 11, and compare 1 Macc. iii. 41. On the richness and abundance of the spoil taken after the battle, see 1 Macc. iv. 23.

and pursued them far.] To Gazara, Azotus, Jamnia, and the borders of Idumæa (ibid. v. 15).

but lacking time they returned.] The writer of the First Book attributes the short pursuit and speedy return of Judas's army to the fact that Gorgias, with an unbroken body of Syro-Macedonian troops, was in the immediate neighbourhood, and had to be guarded against (1 Macc. iv. 15–18). He says nothing of the approach of the Sabbath.

27. when they had gathered their armour together.] Here there is an "undesigned coincidence" between the accounts of the two historians. The writer of the First Book notes, that the troops of Judas before the battle

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 166. selves about the sabbath, yielding exceeding praise and thanks to the Lord, who had preserved them unto that day, which was the beginning of mercy distilling upon them.

28 And after the sabbath, when they had given part of the spoils to the ‖maimed, and the widows, and orphans, the residue they divided among themselves and their servants.

‖ Or, lamed with tortures.

29 When this was done, and they had made a common supplication, they besought the merciful Lord to be reconciled with his servants for ever.

30 Moreover of those that were with Timotheus and Bacchides, who fought against them, they slew above twenty thousand, and very easily got high and strong holds, and divided among themselves many spoils more, and made the ‖maimed, orphans, widows, yea, and the aged also, equal in spoils with themselves.

B. C. cir. 165.

‖ Or, lamed.

31 And when they had gathered their armour together, they laid them up all carefully in convenient places, and the remnant of the spoils they brought to Jerusalem.

32 They slew also Phylarches, that wicked person, who was with Timotheus, and had annoyed the Jews many ways.

33 Furthermore at such time as they kept the feast for the victory in

"had neither armour nor swords to their mind," but says nothing of their stripping the dead after their victory. The author of the Second supplies this fact, without having previously noted the want of satisfactory arms on the part of the Israelites.

yielding exceeding praise and thanks to the Lord.] Compare 1 Macc. iv. 24.

which was the beginning of mercy distilling upon them.] Our translators preferred the reading στάξαντος or στάξαντι, which is followed also by the Vulgate. But the ordinary reading of the MSS. (τάξαντος or τάξαντι) is more probable, and gives as good a sense. Translate, "and had appointed a beginning of mercy for them." The author, apparently, is not aware of the previous victories of Judas over Apollonius and Seron (1 Macc. iii. 10–24).

28. the maimed.] Those who had been injured, without being killed, by the persecutors. Compare ch. vii. 1–4.

29. they . . . made a common supplication.] The "supplication" was apparently additional to the thanksgiving of v. 27, and subsequent to it. No mention is made of it by the writer of the First Book.

§ 3. Further Successes of Judas against Timotheus and Bacchides.

30–33. The successes here briefly mentioned seem to be those which the writer of the First Book considers to have been gained over Lysias (1 Macc. iv. 28–34), and which belong to the year B.C. 165–164, the year following the defeat of Nicanor. It is possible that Timotheus and Bacchides were generals under Lysias during the campaign of this year, though they are not mentioned by the writer of the First Book.

30. they slew above twenty thousand.] In the great battle between Judas and Lysias 5,000 only were slain (1 Macc. iv. 34; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, § 5). There may have been other engagements with his generals; but it is not at all likely that the entire loss of the Syro-Macedonians in the campaign can have reached the figure here given. "Twenty thousand" is a favourite number with our author. (See ch. viii. 9; x. 17, 23, 31.)

and . . . got high and strong holds.] One of these was certainly Bethsura (Beth-Zur), which fell into the hands of Judas after the defeat of Lysias, according to the writer of the First Book. (See 1 Macc. iv. 29, 61.)

31. when they had gathered their armour together.] See the comment on v. 27. The Jewish levies were still glad to obtain the superior arms and armour of their enemies. (See 1 Macc. iii. 12; iv. 6.)

32. They slew also Phylarches.] Rather, "the phylarch." Had the word been a proper name, it would not have been accompanied by the article. Moreover, the proper name is "Phylarch*us*," not "Phylarch*es*."

that wicked person.] Rather, "a most impious person." Nothing more is known of him than what is here stated.

33. at such time as they kept the feast for the victory.] Victories were celebrated by festivals both among the heathen and among the Jews. In the case of a great victory, the day was sometimes observed annually (ch. xv. 36; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 5).

in their country.] Jerusalem is probably meant rather than Judæa, since there would have been no need to state that Judæa was the scene of a Jewish feast.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 165. their country they burnt Callisthenes, that had set fire upon the holy gates, who had fled into a little house; and so he received a reward meet for his wickedness.

34 As for that most ungracious Nicanor, who had brought a thousand f ver. 25. merchants f to buy the Jews,

35 He was through the help of the Lord brought down by them, of whom he made least account; and putting off his glorious apparel, and discharging his company, he came like a fugitive servant through the midland unto Antioch, having very great dishonour, for that his host was destroyed. B. C. cir. 165.

36 Thus he, that g took upon him g ver. 10.
to make good to the Romans their tribute by means of the captives in Jerusalem, told abroad, that the Jews had God to fight for them, and therefore they could not be hurt, because they followed the laws that he gave them.

CHAPTER IX.

1 Antiochus is chased from Persepolis. 5 He is stricken with a sore disease, 14 and promiseth to become a Jew. 28 He dieth miserably.

they burnt Callisthenes.] According to the majority of MSS., the passage runs thus:—"They burnt those who had set fire to the holy gates, namely Callisthenes and certain others, who had all fled into one small house; and so they received a reward meet for their wickedness." Grimm prefers the reading which our translators have followed; but it is a fatal objection to it, that it makes the writer say that "one man fled into one small house" (εἰς ἓν οἰκίδιον), as if it were possible for a man to fly into several. If it be said that ἓν may be an equivalent of τι (Wahl, 'Clavis Lib. Apoc.' ad voc. εἷς), the reply is, that in no other passage does the writer of this Book, whose Greek is (on the whole) good, make this unclassical substitution. The fact of the burning may be compared with what is related in ch. vi. 11, and vii. 5, 8, &c. If the one side employed this horrid mode of execution, the other side was in a manner driven to it.

that had set fire upon the holy gates.] See 1 Macc. iv. 38.

§ 4. NICANOR'S FLIGHT, AND TESTIMONY CONCERNING THE JEWS.

34–36. According to our author, Nicanor, after his defeat, disguised himself, and, dismissing his retinue, returned to Antioch a solitary fugitive. Arrived there, he bore witness to the Providence which kept watch over the Jews, and declared his conviction that under the protection of their resistless God they were invincible. But little trust can be placed in any portion of these statements, which have the appearance of rhetorical embellishments. (See ch. ii. 29.)

34. that most ungracious Nicanor.] Literally, "the threefold sinner." Compare ch. xv. 3. The epithet is applied to Haman in the 'Additions to Esther,' ch. xvi. 15, where our translators render it by "wicked wretch."

who had brought a thousand merchants.] Rather, "the man who brought the thousand merchants to buy the Jews." The writer speaks as if he had mentioned the thousand merchants before, which he had certainly not done, either in v. 11 or elsewhere; or else as if the number was a well-known fact. It is probably one of his exaggerations.

35. putting off his glorious apparel.] I.e. his dress as commander of the army.

and discharging his company.] Rather, "his retinue." Literally, the phrase used is, "making himself a solitary."

having very great dishonour.] Rather, "having met with a great misfortune."

36. that took upon him to make good to the Romans their tribute.] See the comment on v. 10. It is there shewn that no tribute was at this time payable by the Syro-Macedonians to the Romans.

the Jews . . . could not be hurt.] Literally, "could not be wounded," or "were invulnerable;" but the meaning is, that they could not be conquered. Compare the testimony which Heliodorus is said by the writer to have borne, when he returned to Antioch from Jerusalem after the failure of his attempt to plunder the Temple treasury (ch. iii. 36–39).

CHAPTER IX.

§ 5. THE EXPEDITION OF ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES INTO PERSIA, AND THE AFFLICTION THAT BEFELL HIM AS HE WAS RETURNING.

1–10. This entire chapter runs parallel with 1 Macc. vi. 1–16. The accounts agree (1) with respect to the attempt made by Antiochus to plunder a Persian temple, and its frustration by popular resistance; (2) with respect to news reaching him on his way home of the reverses which had befallen his

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

ABOUT that time came Antiochus ‖with dishonour [a]out of the country of Persia.

‖ Or, disorderly.

[a] 1 Mac. 6. 1, &c.

2 For he had entered the city called Persepolis, and went about to rob the temple, and to hold the city; whereupon the multitude running to defend themselves with their weapons put them to flight; and so it happened, that Antiochus being put to flight of the inhabitants returned with shame.

3 Now when he came to Ecbatane, news was brought him what had happened unto Nicanor and Timotheus.

4 Then swelling with anger, he thought to avenge upon the Jews the disgrace done unto him by those that made him flee. Therefore commanded he his chariotman to drive without ceasing, and to dispatch the journey, the judgment of God now following him. For he had spoken proudly in this sort, That he would come to Jerusalem, and make it a common buryingplace of the Jews.

B. C. cir. 163.

5 But the Lord Almighty, the God of Israel, smote him with an incurable and invisible plague: for as soon as he had spoken these words, [b]a pain of the bowels that was reme-

[b] 1 Mac. 6. 8, 9, 13.

arms in the Jewish war; (3) with respect to the fact of his then falling into a severe illness, from the effects of which after a little time he died. They differ (1) in the place where the temple was situated; (2) in the cause and character of the sickness; and (3) in the steps taken by Antiochus when he knew that he was dying. The account in 1 Macc. vi. has more air of truth about it than that of our present author.

1. came Antiochus with dishonour out of . . . Persia.] Rather, "it happened that Antiochus had set off with dishonour on his return." He died at Tabæ, in Persia (Polyb. xxxi. 11, § 3). The "dishonour" is explained in the next verse.

2. he had entered the city called Persepolis.] Polybius (l. s. c.) and Appian ('Syriac.' § 66) place the temple which Epiphanes tried to plunder in Elymaïs, and therefore considerably to the north-west of Persepolis, which was in Persia Proper.

the multitude running to defend themselves.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 3, 4: "They of the city, having had warning, rose up against him in battle." Polybius agrees, but Appian says that he succeeded in plundering the temple.

3. when he came to Ecbatane.] According to the author of the First Book, Epiphanes after his repulse set out for Babylon (ch. vi. 4), but died, before reaching it, in Persia (vv. 5, 16). Ecbatana would lie very far to the north of this route.

news was brought him what had happened.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 5–7. This writer includes in the news the recovery of the Temple by Maccabeus, which our author seems to place later (ch. x. 1–3).

4. the disgrace done unto him by those that made him flee.] I.e. his repulse from the temple which he had tried to plunder (v. 2).

the judgment of God now following him.] Rather, "when the judgment of heaven was now approaching him." The original expresses the idea of the judgment being just on the point of falling. The actual fall is declared in the next verse.

5. the Lord Almighty.] Literally, "the All-supervising" or "All-superintending Lord." The author of the Book aims at strongly impressing upon his readers God's superintending providence and constant watchfulness over the world, and especially over the actions of its inhabitants. He does not view God so much in the light of an Almighty Being (παντοκράτωρ), able to create worlds out of nothing and destroy them by the breath of His mouth, as in the light of an All-watchful Being (πανεπόπτης), constantly supervising human life and actions, with the special intent of bringing vengeance down on the proud and overbearing, and shewing mercy on the sinner who is self-abased and penitent. (See ch. ii. 22; iii. 24–29, 38, 39; v. 17–20; vi. 12–16; vii. 6, 23, 28, 31–36; viii. 2–4, 18, 29, 35, &c.)

smote him with an incurable and invisible plague.] It is remarkable that Polybius so far agrees with our author as to ascribe the death of Epiphanes to a Divine visitation (δαιμονήσας ἐξέλιπε τὸν βίον). He connects the visitation, however, with the attempt upon the Elymæan temple. Josephus, not without reason, objects to this view, that the accomplished sacrilege at Jerusalem was more calculated to draw down the Divine vengeance than the contemplated profanation in Elymaïs ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 1). The author of the First Book of Maccabees considers the death natural, a pining away through grief and disappointment (ch. vi. 8–13). But it is hard to say where what is natural ends, and what is providential begins.

a pain of the bowels, &c.] The physical

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. diless came upon him, and sore torments of the inner parts;

6 And that most justly: for he had tormented other men's bowels with many and strange torments.

7 Howbeit he nothing at all ceased from his bragging, but still was filled with pride, breathing out fire in his rage against the Jews, and commanding to haste the journey: but it came to pass that he fell down from his chariot, carried violently; so that having a sore fall, all the members of his body were much pained.

8 And thus he that a little afore thought he might command the waves of the sea, (so proud was he beyond the condition of man) and weigh the high mountains in a balance, was now cast on the ground, and carried in an horselitter, shewing forth unto all the manifest power of God.

B. C. cir. 163.

9 So that [c]the worms rose up out of the body of this wicked man, and whiles he lived in sorrow and pain, his flesh fell away, and the filthiness of his smell was noisome to all his army.

[c] Acts 12. 23.

10 And the man, that thought a little afore he could reach to the stars of heaven, no man could endure to carry for his intolerable stink.

descriptions of our author (vv. 5–12) are probably "evolved from his inner consciousness." They receive no kind of confirmation from any of the other accounts.

6. And that most justly.] Here we have the origin of the narrative. Antiochus was made to suffer that which the Jewish writers thought it would have been strict justice for him to have suffered.

7. he nothing at all ceased from his bragging.] Rather, "from his haughtiness."

he fell down from his chariot, carried violently.] This tale is probably derived from the fact related by Granius Licinianus, that, on its way to Antioch, his body fell into a river, through the animals by which it was conveyed taking fright.

all the members of his body were much pained.] Rather, "were racked." Nemesis required this, as he had himself racked many.

8. he that a little afore thought he might command the waves of the sea.] See above, ch. v. 21. The meaning is that Epiphanes thought himself a god upon earth. It is certain that he allowed himself to be addressed as "God" (θεὸς) by his subjects (Joseph. 'A. J.' xii. 5, § 5), and assumed the same title upon his coins (Eckhel, 'Doct. Num.' vol. iii. p. 224 et seqq.). How far he himself believed in his own divinity may be a question.

and weigh the high mountains in a balance.] Compare Isaiah xl. 12, where God is said to have "weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance."

cast on the ground.] See v. 7.

carried in an horselitter.] Rather, "in a litter." It is not said that the litter was drawn by horses; and we may gather from v. 10 that, at first at any rate, it was borne on the shoulders of men. Egyptian litters were certainly thus borne (Rawlinson, 'History of Ancient Egypt,' vol. i. p. 535), and so was the Roman lectica.

9. the worms.] Rather, "worms." The Greek has no article. On this form of malady, see Herod. iv. 205; Plut. 'Vit. Artaxerx.' § 16; Acts xii. 23.

his flesh fell away.] "Piecemeal," as Grimm observes; one portion of flesh at one time, one at another. The description is graphic, but drawn probably from the imagination of the writer. Polybius gives no hint of any such terrible end, nor is it prophesied in the Book of Daniel.

the filthiness of his smell.] Compare vv. 10 and 12. This would be a natural feature of the disease described; but the author's knowledge of it does not add anything to the credibility of his narrative.

10. the man that thought . . . he could reach to the stars of heaven.] The idealised king of Babylon is declared by Isaiah to have "said in his heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God . . . I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High" (ch. xiv. 13, 14).

§ 6. ANTIOCHUS HUMBLES HIMSELF, AND PROMISES FREEDOM AND FAVOUR TO THE JEWS.

11–17. Our author regards Antiochus as brought to feel remorse at any rate, if not true repentance, by his sufferings—as acknowledging in them the hand of God, and proceeding from such acknowledgment to make four solemn promises to God on the subject of Jerusalem and the Jews: viz., (a) a promise that he would make Jerusalem a free city; (b) a promise that he would give

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

11 Here therefore, being plagued, he began to leave off his great pride, and to come to the knowledge of himself by the scourge of God, his pain increasing every moment.

12 And when he himself could not abide his own smell, he said these words, It is meet to be subject unto God, and that a man that is mortal should not proudly think of himself, as if he were God.

13 This wicked person vowed also unto the Lord, who now no more would have mercy upon him, saying thus,

B. C. cir. 163.

14 That the holy city (to the which he was going in haste, to lay it even with the ground, and to make it a common buryingplace,) he would set at liberty:

15 And as touching the Jews, whom he had judged not worthy so much as to be buried, but to be cast out with their children to be devoured of the fowls and wild beasts, he would make them all equals to the citizens of ‖Athens:

‖ Or, Antioch.

16 And the holy temple, which before he had spoiled, he would garnish with goodly gifts, and restore all the holy vessels with many more, all Jews the Athenian (Antiochian?) citizenship; (c) a promise that he would restore the holy vessels to the Temple and re-establish the ancient worship; and (d) a promise that he would himself become a Jew, and go through the world proclaiming the power of the God of the Jews. In these statements, and in the "letter" which follows (vv. 19–27), we have probably exaggerations and embellishments of the fact recorded by the author of the First Book (ch. vi. 12, 13), that in his last illness Epiphanes expressed regret for his cruel treatment of the Jews, and his desecration of the Temple.

11. being plagued.] Rather, "being broken in spirit."

by the scourge of God, his pain increasing every moment.] Rather, "the pain that he suffered through the scourge of God increasing every moment." The "scourge of God" is the disease that had fallen upon him. (See v. 5.)

12. when he . . . could not abide his own smell.] Compare vv. 9, 10.

13. the Lord, who now no more would have mercy upon him.] It is possible to exhaust the patience and mercy of God. "Esau found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (Heb. xii. 17). "Wisdom" warns men in the Book of Proverbs: "Because I have called, and ye have refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof; I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you; then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me; for that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord; they would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own ways, and be filled with their own devices. For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them" (Prov. i. 24–33). Antiochus had reached this point. He had provoked God beyond endurance. He had "filled up the measure of his iniquity." Nothing remained for him, but that "fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation" whereof the Apostle speaks to the Hebrews (Heb. x. 27).

14. the holy city to the which he was going in haste.] See above, vv. 5 and 7.

he would set at liberty.] I.e. restore to the degree of freedom which it had enjoyed under his father Seleucus (ch. iii. 1–3).

15. the Jews, whom he had judged not worthy so much as to be buried.] This piece of savagery is not ascribed to Epiphanes by any other author, and cannot be accepted as true on the unsupported authority of the present writer.

he would make them all equals to the citizens of Athens.] If the text is sound, we must suppose that (in the view of the author) Antiochus had conferred on all Athenians a certain status, perhaps isopolity, within his dominions, and that he now expressed the intention of conferring a similar privilege on the Jews. Perhaps, however, Ἀθηναίοις is a corruption of Ἀντιοχέσι, and the privilege now promised to all Jews is that already granted to the people of Jerusalem (ch. iv. 9).

16. the . . . temple . . . he would garnish with goodly gifts.] See the comment on ch. iii. 2.

restore all the holy vessels.] See above, ch. v. 16. The vessels had probably, long

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

and [d] out of his own revenue defray the charges belonging to the sacrifices:

17 Yea, and that also he would become a Jew himself, and go through all the world that was inhabited, and declare the power of God.

18 But for all this his pains would not cease: for the just judgment of God was come upon him: therefore despairing of his health, he wrote unto the Jews the letter underwritten, containing the form of a supplication, after this manner:

19 Antiochus, king and governor, to the good Jews his citizens wisheth much joy, health, and prosperity: B. C. cir. 163.

20 If ye and your children fare well, and your affairs be to your contentment, I give very great thanks to God, having my hope in heaven.

21 As for me, I was weak, or else I would have remembered kindly your honour and good will. Returning out of Persia, and being taken with a grievous disease, I thought it necessary to care for the common safety of all:

22 Not distrusting mine health,

[d] So Ezra 6. 9. 1 Mac. 10. 39, 40.

before this, been melted down at the royal mint, to help the king's necessities. He might, however, have given back others like them; and this is perhaps what is meant.

and out of his own revenue defray the charges.] As his father had done (ch. iii. 3).

17. he would become a Jew himself.] I.e. a proselyte. It is extremely improbable that Epiphanes ever expressed any such intention.

§ 7. Supposed Letter of Antiochus to the Jewish Nation.

18–27. Jason of Cyrene had apparently an especial liking for documents, and accepted any that came in his way without subjecting them to a very searching criticism. The present "letter" is a manifest forgery; since (a) it is written in slipshod Greek such as no educated Hellene would have put on paper; (b) it gives Epiphanes a title (στρατηγὸς, "general") which he would never have condescended to take; (c) it makes Epiphanes say that he had often visited the inland provinces, whereas he only visited them once; (d) it speaks of his having committed the care of his son to the Jews during these frequent absences! (e) it represents Eupator as grown up, whereas he was certainly no more than twelve years old at his father's death.

18. containing the form of a supplication.] Rather, "bearing the character of a supplication"—written, i.e., in the tone, not of a harsh master, but of a timid supplicant. See especially v. 26.

19. Antiochus, king and governor.] Rather, "king and general." It is not likely that any Syro-Macedonian king would have added the poor title of "general" to the grand one of "king." Such an addition is not made in any of the other letters ascribed to the Seleucidæ. (See 1 Macc. x. 18, 25; xi. 30, 32; xiii. 36; 2 Macc. xi. 22, 27, &c.)

to the good Jews.] An improbable piece of flattery.

his citizens.] They were not yet, except the Jews of Jerusalem, "citizens." Antiochus had only promised to make them such. (See v. 15.)

wisheth much joy, health, and prosperity.] This form is quite unusual. It combines the Greek χαίρειν with the Latin "salutem dat," and adds to them a third good wish, not found elsewhere in salutations of the time and country.

20. If ye . . . fare well.] This Latinism is scarcely likely to have been used by the Syro-Macedonian kings. It is taken from the ordinary "S. V. B. E. E. Q. V." (Compare ch. xi. 28.)

having my hope in heaven.] The use of "Heaven" for "God," common in the Hellenistic Greek of the period (1 Macc. iii. 18, 60; iv. 10, 55, &c.), is not in accordance with the classical Greek idiom.

21. As for me, I was weak, or else.] There is no "or else" in the original, which is absolutely ungrammatical and gives no sense. To produce a sense, either εἰ μὴ must be inserted before ἀσθενῶς, or ἄλλως γὰρ before ὑμῶν.

I would have remembered . . . your honour.] I.e. the honour in which you have held me.

Returning out of Persia.] Literally, "out of the regions about Persia"—the same expression as that used in v. 1.

22. Not distrusting mine health.] Grimm finds a contradiction between this statement and that of v. 18, that Antiochus wrote the letter because he "despaired of his health."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. but having great hope to escape this sickness.

23 But considering that even my father, at what time he led an army into the high countries, appointed a successor,

24 To the end that, if any thing fell out contrary to expectation, or if any tidings were brought that were grievous, they of the land, knowing to whom ‖ the state was left, might not be troubled:

‖ Or, common affairs.

25 Again, considering how that the princes that are borderers and neighbours unto my kingdom wait for opportunities, and expect what shall be the event, I have appointed my son Antiochus king, whom I often committed and commended unto many of you, when I went up into the high provinces; to whom I have written as followeth:

B. C. cir. 163.

26 Therefore I pray and request you to remember the benefits that I have done unto you generally, and in special, and that every man will be still faithful to me and my son.

27 For I am persuaded that he

But it is conceivable that he might really despair of it, yet wish the Jews to think otherwise.

to escape this sickness.] Rather, "to escape from this sickness"—i.e. to survive it, recover from it.

23. my father.] Antiochus III., known as "the Great" (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 65). In the year B.C. 187 this monarch made a journey into the eastern provinces for the purpose of collecting treasure, and, having entered Elymaïs, attempted to plunder a rich temple of Belus, but was met with armed resistance by the natives, who overpowered his attendants, and slew the king himself. (See the comment on ch. i. 17.) It is quite possible that he may have "appointed a successor" before starting on his expedition; but we have no confirmation of our author's statement on this point by any other authority.

the high countries.] Literally, "the upper regions"—i.e. those at a distance from the Syrian sea-coast. (Compare the expression ἡ ἄνω Ἀσίη, so common in Herodotus.)

appointed a successor.] The practice was common in the East, and was followed by Cyrus (Herod. i. 208), by Alyattes (ib. i. 92), by Darius (ib. vii. 3), and many others. A monarch was regarded as entitled to make a selection from among his grown-up sons, and, if no son were grown up, might either name a regent or pass the crown on to a brother. In practice, the law of primogeniture was, for the most part, respected.

24. if anything fell out . . . grievous.] A long periphrasis is preferred to a direct mention of the calamity intended, viz. the king's death, which it was of evil omen to mention. The euphemism is in entire accordance with Oriental practice.

25. Again.] Rather, "And further." the princes that are borderers and neighbours unto my kingdom.] Rather, "the princes that are borderers, and the (other) neighbours unto my kingdom." The "princes" intended are probably Ptolemy Philometor, Attalus of Pergamus, and Ariarathes of Cappadocia; the "other neighbours," the Jews themselves, the Arab tribes, the Idumæans, Moabites, &c. All would be on the look-out for an opportunity to aggrandise themselves, if internal troubles should break out in Syria on the death of the king.

I have appointed my son Antiochus king.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 15. The nomination was necessary in order to give Eupator any title to the throne, since the legitimate heir was Demetrius, son of Seleucus Callinicus, the elder brother of Epiphanes, who was not of age to mount the throne at his father's death, but was now grown to manhood.

whom I often committed and commended unto many of you.] Literally, "to most of you." The "committal" of the young heir to the special guardianship of the Jews, is a fiction of a very barefaced character. The assertion that such a committal had taken place "often" is a further indication of the recklessness and ignorance of the writer. (See the comment on vv. 18–27.)

to whom I have written as followeth.] We must suppose that a second letter, addressed to Eupator, was originally appended to the existing document (vv. 19–27), but that this was omitted, either by Jason of Cyrene, or by our author.

26. I pray . . . you to remember the benefits.] It is perhaps not wholly absurd for Epiphanes to be made to speak of his "benefits" to the Jewish people. He would consider the Antiochene citizenship which he had conferred on the inhabitants of Jerusalem (ch. iv. 9), and perhaps even the permission to set up a gymnasium (ibid.), as "benefits."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

‖ Or, following.

‖ understanding my mind will favourably and graciously yield to your desires.

28 Thus the murderer and blasphemer having suffered most grievously, as he entreated other men, so died he a miserable death in a strange country in the mountains.

29 And Philip, that was brought up with him, carried away his body, who also fearing the son of Antiochus went into Egypt to Ptolemeus Philometor.

B. C. cir. 163.

CHAPTER X.

1 Judas recovereth the city, and purifieth the temple. 14 Gorgias vexeth the Jews. 16 Judas winneth their holds. 29 Timotheus and his men are discomfited. 35 Gazara is taken, and Timotheus slain.

27. understanding my mind.] Rather, "carrying out my intention."

will favourably and graciously yield to your desires.] Literally, "will deal with you graciously and lovingly." The author of the letter would scarcely have made Epiphanes pledge himself so positively as to his son's system of government, had he remembered that Eupator was at his father's death, at most, twelve years of age. Appian says nine ('Syriac.' § 45).

§ 8. Death of Epiphanes and Flight of Philip to Egypt.

28, 29. The death of Epiphanes in Persia is a certain fact. The author of the First Book tells us that, previously to his decease, he appointed Philip, one of his "friends," regent of the kingdom, and guardian of his son Eupator (ch. vi. 14, 15). Philip conducted the Syro-Macedonian army from Tabæ, where Epiphanes died, to Antioch (ibid. 55, 56). He no doubt brought with him the body of the king. At Antioch he was well received and possessed himself of the government (ibid. 63), but was unable to take charge of Eupator, who was absent from the city, with Lysias in Judæa. Lysias, on learning what had happened, patched up a peace with Judas Maccabæus, and marched rapidly against Philip, whom he besieged in Antioch. After a short siege, he took the city by storm; but it is possible that Philip had previously quitted it and escaped to Egypt.

28. the murderer and blasphemer.] Compare ch. v. 12–21; vi. 1–8, &c.

as he entreated other men.] See above, v. 6.

in the mountains.] Here the writer has got hold of a true tradition. Tabæ, where Epiphanes died, was in Elymaïs, a portion of the mountainous Zagros region, which separates the high plateau of Persia from the Mesopotamian lowland. The writer's object in mentioning the fact is (as Grimm notes) rhetorical rather than geographic. He means to say, "This great king died, not in a royal palace, not in a luxurious city, but in a wild and lonesome tract, far from the haunts of civilised men."

29. Philip.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 14, 55, 63. Some critics regard him as identical with "Philip the Phrygian" (2 Macc. v. 22), whom Epiphanes made governor of Jerusalem; but this is scarcely probable. Philip the Phrygian was governor of Jerusalem at the time of the expedition of Gorgias and Nicanor (ch. viii. 8); Philip the regent had probably accompanied Epiphanes into Armenia and Persia previously.

carried away his body.] I.e. "took it with him," to give it honourable burial at Antioch. The meaning, "buried it," or "caused it to be buried," which Grimm suggests, is unsupported by any parallel passage.

who also fearing the son of Antiochus went into Egypt.] It is very questionable whether this passage has any historical value. Our author's statements, when unsupported, must be accepted or rejected, according to their internal probability. Now, it is clear that Philip could not have "feared" Eupator, whose legal protector he had been constituted, until he found, on returning to Antioch, that Lysias was in possession of the boy's person, and was prepared to maintain that he, and not Philip, was the rightful regent. Possibly he may then have gone by sea from Antioch to Alexandria, in the hope of obtaining aid from Philometor; but to quit the capital would, under the circumstances, have been a great risk, and one which he is scarcely likely to have incurred on the faint hope of getting Ptolemy to help him. Or, again, he may, after the siege was begun, have escaped from the town and made his way to Egypt, where Ptolemy may have given him refuge. We have to set against this, however, the positive statement of Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 7), that he was made prisoner at the capture of the city, and put to death by Lysias.

CHAPTER X.

§ 9. Recovery of the Temple by Judas, and Restoration of the Jewish Worship. Institution of the Feast of the Dedication.

1–9. The present writer does not fix the exact date of the recovery of the Temple,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 164. NOW Maccabeus and his company, the Lord guiding them, recovered the temple and the city:

2 But the altars which the heathen had built in the open street, and also the chapels, they pulled down.

3 And having cleansed the temple [a] they made another altar, and striking stones they took fire out of them, and offered a sacrifice after two years, and set forth incense, and lights, and shewbread.

[a] 1 Mac. 4. 47.

4 When that was done, they fell flat down, and besought the Lord that they might come no more into such troubles; but if they sinned any more against him, that he himself would chasten them with mercy, and that they might not be delivered unto the blasphemous and barbarous nations. B. C. 164

5 Now [b] upon the same day that the strangers profaned the temple, on the very same day it was cleansed again, even the five and twentieth day of the same month, which is Casleu. [b] 1 Mac. 4. 52, 54.

which, however, we know from the First Book (ch. iv. 28) to have occurred in B.C. 164. Antiochus died in B.C. 163. Thus, there is a departure from chronological order in chs. ix. and x., the first section of ch. x. (vv. 1–8) belonging to a time anterior to any of the events related in ch. ix. This dislocation does not arise from ignorance on the part of our author, since he not only (in ch. x. 9) states that the recovery took place within the lifetime of Epiphanes, but (in ch. viii. 31) gives an indication that he knew of Jerusalem, or a part of it, being in possession of the patriots before the illness of Epiphanes began. His object in departing from chronological order seems to have been rhetorical. He wished to conclude the second portion of his narrative with the grand event of Judas's earlier career—the recovery of the Temple from the hands of the heathen, and its rededication to the worship of the true God.

1. Maccabeus . . . recovered the temple and the city.] This is an over-statement. All that Judas recovered was the Temple and such part of the city as stood upon the Temple hill. The remainder, including all the buildings upon the western hill, which was the main city, continued in the possession of the Syro-Macedonians until the time of Simon, whose great glory it was that he drove out the heathen from it, and completed the recovery of Jerusalem. (See 1 Macc. iv. 41–60; vi. 18–26; xiii. 49–51; xiv. 36.)

2. the altars which the heathen had built in the open street.] Rather, "in the market-place." It was the custom of the Greeks to have numerous altars to different gods in various parts of their cities. Some of these may have been erected in the agora of the eastern city. (Compare 1 Macc. i. 47, 54.)

and also the chapels.] Rather, "the sacred enclosures." Compare the comment on 1 Macc. i. 47.

3. having cleansed the temple.] See 1 Macc. iv. 43.

they made another altar.] The old altar of burnt offering having been polluted by having an idolatrous altar erected on the top of it (1 Macc. i. 54), it was thought best to pull it down, and build a new one with unhewn stones, in accordance with Ex. xx. 25. (See the fuller narrative of the cleansing in 1 Macc. iv. 41–51.)

and striking stones they took fire out of them.] The author of the First Book omits this characteristic feature. It was quite in accordance with the spirit of the command to build the altar of rough natural stones, the idea being that nature was unpolluted, while everything with which man had come into contact had more or less of pollution attaching to it. We may well accept our author's statement in this place, contradictory as it is to the tale told in ch. i. 18–36, as "the simple historical account" of the matter (Stanley, 'Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 311).

after two years.] This is a mistake. The exact dates of the First Book (1 Macc. i. 54; iv. 52) shew three years to have elapsed between the desecration of the Temple by Epiphanes and its purification by Maccabæus.

incense, and lights, and shewbread.] Compare 1 Macc. iv. 50, 51.

4. they . . . besought the Lord . . . that he himself would chasten them.] So David, when given his choice of punishments (2 Sam. xxiv. 14).

blasphemous and barbarous nations.] See the comment on ch. ii. 21. The cruelties of the Syro-Macedonians might well justify the epithet "barbarous" (ch. v. 12–14, 24–26; vi. 10, 11, 18–31; vii. 3–40, &c.).

5. upon the same day.] Compare 1 Macc i. 59; iv. 52–54. Judas, no doubt, intentionally arranged this exact correspondence, in order that the sense of national humiliation should be swallowed up in that of joy and triumph, when the fated day came round.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 164. 6 [c] And they kept eight days with gladness, as in the feast of the tabernacles, remembering that not long afore they had held the feast of the tabernacles, when as they wandered in the mountains and dens like beasts.

[c] 1 Mac. 4. 56.

7 Therefore they bare branches, and fair boughs, and palms also, and sang psalms unto him that had given them good success in cleansing his place.

[d] 1 Mac. 4. 59. 8 [d] They ordained also by a common statute and decree, That every year those days should be kept of the whole nation of the Jews.

B. C. 164.

9 And this was the end of Antiochus, called Epiphanes.

B. C. 163.

10 Now will we declare the acts of Antiochus Eupator, who was the son of this wicked man, gathering briefly the calamities of the wars.

11 So when he was come to the crown, he set one Lysias over the affairs of his realm, and appointed as in the feast of the tabernacles.] See the next verse, and compare Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 7, § 7; xiii. 13, § 5.

6. they kept eight days.] See the comment on 1 Macc. iv. 56.

not long afore they had held the feast of the tabernacles.] The Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated on the fifteenth day of the month Tisri, or rather from the fifteenth day to the twenty-second, about three months previously to the twenty-fifth of Casleu, or Chisleu. The similarity in the observances customary at the two feasts led to their being known respectively as "the Tabernacle Feast of the Autumn," and "the Tabernacle Feast of the Winter." (See the comment on 1 Macc. iv. 59.)

they wandered in the mountains and dens like beasts.] Compare ch. v. 27. The writer seems to forget that the patriots had long since issued from their fastnesses, and made themselves masters of towns and villages (ch. viii. 6), and become a power in the land (ibid. 16–32).

7. they bare branches, and fair boughs, and palms also.] Compare Neh. viii. 15. They made the Feast of the Dedication a sort of supplement to that of Tabernacles, which had no doubt been celebrated under difficulties, while the campaign against Gorgias and Nicanor was going on, and had been shorn of some of its customary rites.

8. They ordained also by a common statute and decree.] See 1 Macc. iv. 59. The festival continued to be celebrated in the time of our Lord's ministry (John x. 22), and indeed was only discontinued when the Temple was finally destroyed.

9. this was the end of Antiochus, called Epiphanes.] Rather, "And thus ended the reign of Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes." The writer does not refer to the circumstances of Epiphanes' death, but simply notes that this is the point in his narrative where the reign of Epiphanes ends and that of Eupator begins. It is also the point where the Third Portion of his work ends, and the Fourth Portion begins.

PART IV.

THE WAR OF JUDAS WITH ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR.

§ 1. Lysias succeeds Ptolemy Macron as Governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia.

10–13. In accordance with his idea that Eupator was grown to manhood at his father's death, and had the actual direction of affairs (see the comment on ch. ix. 18–27), the writer represents him as selecting Lysias for high office, and assigning him a certain command. In reality, Lysias had been left at the head of affairs in Syria by Epiphanes, when he departed for the East (1 Macc. iii. 32–38) and had been made Eupator's guardian (v. 33). When Epiphanes died, Eupator was at the most twelve years old, and was a mere puppet in the hands of the regent. Lysias proclaimed him, and ruled in his name (1 Macc. vi. 17), but kept all power in his own hands (ibid. 53–60). It is not likely that he held at any time so subordinate an office as that of "governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia:" and if Ptolemy was at this time superseded, it cannot have been with the object of Lysias taking his place.

10. Antiochus Eupator.] On the name and reign of this prince, see Appian, 'Syriaca,' § 45;—Polyb. xxxi. 12, § 7; 19, § 2;—Porphyr. ap. Euseb. 'Chron. Can.' Part i. 40, § 15, &c. His age at his father's death, according to Appian, was nine; according to Porphyry, twelve.

gathering briefly the calamities of the wars.] Compare above, ch. ii. 31, where the author promises "brevity."

11. he set one Lysias over the affairs of his realm.] It has been noted above, that Lysias was placed in power, not by Eupator, but by Epiphanes, and that the boy Eupator was a puppet in his hands. Lysias is strangely intro-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163. him chief governor of Celosyria and Phenice.

12 For Ptolemeus, that was called Macron, choosing rather to do justice unto the Jews for the wrong that had been done unto them, endeavoured to continue peace with them.

13 Whereupon being accused of the king's friends before Eupator, and called traitor at every word, because he had left Cyprus, that Philometor had committed unto him, and departed to Antiochus Epiphanes, ‖and seeing that he was in no honourable place, he was so discouraged, that he poisoned himself and died. B. C. 163

‖ Or, and not bearing his authority as becometh a nobleman.

14 But when Gorgias was governor of the ‖holds, he hired soldiers, and nourished war continually with the Jews:

‖ Or, strong places.

15 And therewithal the Idumeans, duced in this place as "one Lysias," or "a certain Lysias" (Λυσίαν τινά), an expression which commonly denotes obscurity of birth and condition. Lysias was in fact, as the writer very well knew (ch. xi. 1), a member of the royal family, and one of the most distinguished persons in the kingdom. He was the actual ruler of Syria for above three years, from the departure of Antiochus for the East in B.C. 166–5, to his own destruction by Demetrius in B.C. 162–1. He is mentioned as regent of Syria by Appian, Polybius, Livy, and Porphyry. (See the comment on 1 Macc. iii. 32.)

12. Ptolemeus, that was called Macron.] Evidently the same with the Ptolemeus mentioned as "governor of Cœlesyria and Phœnice" in ch. viii. 8, and therefore probably the same as "Ptolemee, son of Dorymenes" (1 Macc. iii. 38; 2 Macc. iv. 45, 46).

choosing rather to do justice unto the Jews.] It has been made an argument against the identification of Ptolemy Macron with Ptolemy the son of Dorymenes (Grimm), that the latter was ill-disposed to the Jews (2 Macc. vi. 8), while the former favoured them. But there is no difficulty in conceiving that a better acquaintance with the nation may have induced the governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia to change his policy.

for the wrong that had been done unto them.] The wrong done was such as might well have called forth the pity of a conscientious heathen. (See ch. v. 12–26; vi. 1–11, 18–31; vii. 1–41, &c.)

endeavoured to continue peace with them.] Rather, "endeavoured to manage his dealings with them peaceably." Ptolemy thought that the policy of war and violence hitherto pursued was wrong, and recommended a complete change. He would have had all the matters in dispute arranged by negotiation and diplomacy.

13. being accused of the king's friends.] The simplest translation would be—"by his friends;" but as this is unlikely, we may perhaps accept the gloss of our translators, who have regarded "the friends" as "the king's friends"—i.e. the courtiers of the first rank, who bore that title. (See 1 Macc. ii. 18; iii. 38; vi. 28; vii. 8; x. 20, 60, 65, &c.)

before Eupator.] Formally, the boy king may have presided at the investigation; but the real judge of the cause must have been Lysias.

because he had left Cyprus, &c.] See Polyb. xxvii. 11. Ptolemy Macron had been appointed governor of Cyprus by Philometor, but in the campaign of B.C. 169 had deserted his cause, and made the island over to Epiphanes. It was hard that he should be taxed with treachery by the side to which he had deserted.

and departed.] Rather, "and gone over."

§ 2. GORGIAS, IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE IDUMÆANS, MAKES WAR UPON JUDAS. SUCCESSES OF JUDAS.

14–23. We seem here to have an account, given with some detail, of the Idumæan war briefly touched on by the writer of the First Book in ch. v. 2, 3. We learn from the present passage that Gorgias had a share in the operations, which however were chiefly in the Idumæan country, where Judas made himself master of various strongholds, and put to death their garrisons. It is impossible to accept our author's numbers, in vv. 17, 23; but we may gather from his statements that the Maccabee leader acted during the campaign with great severity, both towards the enemy and towards those of his own party who were inclined to leniency. (See vv. 20–22.)

14. when Gorgias was governor of the holds.] Gorgias had been previously mentioned as "a captain of great experience," and as joined with Nicanor in the campaign of B.C. 165 (ch. viii. 9). The active part which he took in that campaign appears from 1 Macc. iv. 1–5, 18–22.

he hired soldiers.] I.e. "he collected a force of mercenaries." Compare what is said of Lysias in 1 Macc. iv. 35.

15. And therewithal the Idumeans.] Rather, "And in conjunction with him the Idumæans also."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163. having gotten into their hands the most commodious holds, kept the Jews occupied, and receiving those that were banished from Jerusalem, they went about to nourish war.

16 Then they that were with Maccabeus made supplication, and besought God that he would be their helper; and so they ran with violence upon the strong holds of the Idumeans, 17 And assaulting them strongly, they won the holds, and kept off all that fought upon the wall, and slew all that fell into their hands, and killed no fewer than twenty thousand.

18 And because certain, who were no less than nine thousand, were fled together into two very strong castles, having all manner of things convenient to sustain the siege, B. C. 163.

19 Maccabeus left Simon and Joseph, and Zaccheus also, and them that were with him, who were enough to besiege them, and departed himself unto those places which more needed his help.

20 Now ‖ they that were with Simon, being led with covetousness, were persuaded for money through certain of those that were in the castle, and took seventy thousand drachms, and let some of them escape. ‖ Or, Simon.

21 But when it was told Maccabeus what was done, he called the having gotten into their hands the most commodious holds.] Rather, "being masters of certain commodious strongholds." It is not implied that they had recently taken these holds, but only that they were in possession of them.

receiving those that were banished from Jerusalem.] It was a natural consequence of the recovery of the Temple hill by Judas, that a number of those Jews whom he found established there should be expelled from their homes and driven to seek a refuge elsewhere. They would be necessarily Jews of the Hellenizing party, whose continued presence within the recovered portion of the city would be a danger. Compare the exodus of the inhabitants from the western city, when it was taken by Simon (1 Macc. xiii. 50).

16. ran with violence.] Rather, "marched hastily."

17. kept off all that fought upon the wall.] Rather, "repulsed" them, "drove them back."

slew all that fell into their hands.] Rather, "all with whom they fell in." It is not intended that there was a massacre of prisoners in cold blood, but that the soldiers of Judas, when they burst into each town, killed every one whom they found in the streets. Their proceedings were in accordance with the barbarous usage of the time.

and killed no fewer than twenty thousand.] This number is quite incredible, and may be confidently regarded as one of our author's many exaggerations. "Twenty thousand" recurs too frequently in his estimates to have any historical value. (See ch. viii. 9, 30; ch. x. 23, 31.)

18. certain, who were no less than nine thousand, were fled . . . into two . . . castles.] Rather, "into two towers." Nine hundred would be a more probable number than "nine thousand" for "two towers" to receive and shelter.

19. Simon and Joseph, and Zaccheus.] "Simon" is, no doubt, the elder brother of Judas (1 Macc. ii. 3), whom Judas commonly made his second in command (1 Macc. v. 20, 55; 2 Macc. viii. 22). "Joseph" is probably, as in ch. viii. 22, the eldest son of the family, whose real name was "Joannan," or John (1 Macc. ii. 2). Zaccheus is otherwise unknown.

20. they that were with Simon.] The ordinary meaning of the phrase used is "Simon and his friends;" but it would seem to have here a narrower meaning, and to designate strictly "those who were about Simon," i.e. his chief officers. They may have acted without his authority or knowledge.

in the castle.] Rather, "in the castles" or "towers." seventy thousand drachms.] About 2840*l.* At the ordinary rate of a mina for a man, this sum should have ransomed 700 persons.

21. when it was told Maccabeus.] Judas, having returned from the expedition glanced at in v. 19, learnt what had been done in his absence. He appears to have been greatly angered. To spare the lives of enemies given by God into his hand he regarded as inexcusable, since it was an endangering of the lives of Israelites, whom the escaped enemies might afterwards kill in battle. He therefore determined to visit the offence with exemplary punishment.

he called the governors of the people to-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163. governors of the people together, and accused those men, that they had sold their brethren for money, and set their enemies free to fight against them.

22 So he slew those that were found traitors, and immediately took the two castles.

23 And having good success with his weapons in all things he took in hand, he slew in the two holds more than twenty thousand.

[c] 1 Mac. 5. 6, 7. 24 Now Timotheus, [c] whom the Jews had overcome before, when he had gathered a great multitude of foreign forces, and horses out of Asia not a few, came as though he would take Jewry by force of arms.

25 But when he drew near, [‖] they that were with Maccabeus turned themselves to pray unto God, and sprinkled earth upon their heads, and girded their loins with sackcloth, B. C. 163. ‖ Or, Maccabeus, and they that were with him.

26 And fell down at the foot of the altar, and besought him to be merciful to them, and to be [f] an enemy to their enemies, and an adversary to their adversaries, as the law declareth. [f] Exod. 23. 22. Deut. 28. 7.

27 So after the prayer they took their weapons, and went on further from the city: and when they drew near to their enemies, they kept by themselves.

gether.] Rather, "the leaders of the people;" who, when the people were engaged in a campaign, would be their officers.

and accused those men.] The men had a formal trial. Judas was not the judge, but the prosecutor. They were condemned by their peers.

they had sold their brethren for money.] See v. 20.

23. he slew in the two holds more than twenty thousand.] Compare the comment on v. 17; and remark, that 9,000 only are said to have taken refuge in the towers (v. 18); that a certain number of these had been allowed to escape (v. 20): yet that at the final assault the slain are, as in the strongholds previously captured (v. 17), "twenty thousand"!

§ 3. CAMPAIGN AGAINST TIMOTHEUS. HIS SUPPOSED DEATH.

24–38. This campaign of Judas against Timotheus is probably the one briefly described in 1 Macc. v. 6–8, which terminates, like this, with the capture of a "Jazar" or "Gazara." It is true that this campaign begins near Jerusalem (vv. 26, 27), while that of the First Book is wholly in the Ammonite country; but we may reconcile the two narratives by supposing an omission of the earlier circumstances of the campaign by the author of 1 Macc., and an imperfect knowledge of the geographical data on the part of the present writer. Timotheus may have begun by invading Judæa and threatening Jerusalem, but may afterwards have withdrawn across the Jordan, whither Judas may have pursued him.

24. Timotheus, whom the Jews had overcome before.] See above, ch. viii. 30. The author of the First Book makes no mention of this earlier defeat.

foreign forces.] By "foreign forces" the writer means "hired mercenaries." On the employment of such troops by the Syro-Macedonians, see 1 Macc. iv. 35; 2 Macc. x. 14.

horses out of Asia not a few.] To mount a portion of his mercenaries, Gorgias purchased horses in various parts of Asia, as (probably) Media, Armenia, and perhaps Persia. The Median horses were especially famous.

25. they that were with Maccabeus . . . sprinkled earth upon their heads.] It was more usual to sprinkle ashes upon the head (2 Sam. xiii. 19; Job ii. 8, 12; Jonah iii. 6; Lam. ii. 10); but, if ashes were not at hand, earth was used (1 Sam. iv. 12; 2 Sam. i. 2, xv. 32; Neh. ix. 1; 1 Macc. xi. 71, &c.).

26. fell down at the foot of the altar.] This shews that Judas and his army were at Jerusalem, at the time when Timotheus invaded Judæa, and "drew near" to them.

and besought him.] I.e. "besought God," before whose altar they had prostrated themselves.

as the law declareth.] See Ex. xxiii. 22: "I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, and an adversary unto thine adversaries."

27. after the prayer they . . . went on further from the city.] Rather, "they went on a long distance from the city"—across the Jordan into the country of the Ammonites, according to the author of the First Book (ch. v. 6). Timotheus had probably found that he could not attack the newly-fortified Temple hill (ib. iv. 60) with any prospect of success, and, after threatening it for a while, had removed into the Transjordanic territory.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163. 28 Now the sun being newly risen, they joined both together; the one part having together with their virtue their refuge also unto the Lord for a ‖pledge of their success and victory: the other side making their rage leader of their battle.

‖ Or, warrant, or, surety.

29 But when the battle waxed strong, [g] there appeared unto the enemies from heaven five comely men upon horses, with bridles of gold, and two of them led the Jews, [g] See ch. 2. 21.

30 And took Maccabeus betwixt them, and covered him on every side with their weapons, and kept him safe, but shot arrows and lightnings against the enemies: so that being confounded with blindness, and full of trouble, they were killed. B. C. 163.

31 And there were slain of footmen twenty thousand and five hundred, and six hundred horsemen.

32 As for Timotheus himself, he fled into a very strong hold, called Gazara, where Chereas was governor.

they kept by themselves.] I.e. "they halted"—they did not at once engage the enemy, but encamped at a little distance.

28. Now the sun, &c.] Translate, "and when the sun was newly risen, both sides advanced to the attack." Each army was equally eager to attack the other—there was a simultaneous advance.

their refuge . . . unto the Lord.] I.e. the fact that they had resorted to God, and cast all their care upon Him (see v. 23). This act of faith wrought in them a confidence of success, which had a supernatural foundation. Their adversaries were animated by mere natural courage and high spirit (θυμός).

29. when the battle waxed strong.] Rather, "waxed fierce"—i.e. when both sides fought bravely, and neither had any advantage over the other.

there appeared unto the enemies from heaven five comely men.] Compare ch. ii. 25, 26. The interference of angelic beings in the combats of men upon earth was widely credited in antiquity. Ares and Aphrodité took a prominent part in the battles under the walls of Troy (Hom. 'Il.' v. 840–63). A celestial warrior fought on the Greek side at Marathon, and carried dismay into the ranks of the Persians (Herod. vi. 117). When Delphi was attacked, two local demigods aided the Greeks who defended it, and put the assailants to flight (ibid. viii. 38, 39). At the battle of the Regillus Castor and Pollux lent their assistance to the Romans, and were mainly instrumental in securing them the victory (Dion. Hal. vi. 12). Such stories are poetic embodiments of beliefs entertained by the combatants, that they enjoyed supernatural protection. Our author is a firm believer in the reality of his apparitions. (See ch. iii. 25, 26, 33, 34; xi. 8.)

upon horses.] So the adversary of Heliodorus (ch. iii. 25), and the angel who assisted Maccabæus (ch. xi. 8).

with bridles of gold.] The horse on which the adversary of Heliodorus sat had complete harness of gold; the angelic assistant of Judas was clothed in a panoply of gold. So, in the Revelation of St. John, the "seven angels" have "their breasts girded with golden girdles" (ch. xv. 6). Gold is assigned to angels on account of its purity, beauty, and value.

two of them.] Literally, "the two"—i.e. "the principal two," whose chief business it was to protect Judas. (See the next verse.)

30. covered him on every side with their weapons.] Literally, "with their panoplies."

shot arrows and lightnings.] Employed against the enemy both human and divine weapons. So the deities who protected the temple of Delphi not only brought a storm of thunder and lightning upon the invaders (Herod. vii. 37), but also slew the hindmost of them, as they fled away, with spear and sword (ibid. 38).

being confounded with blindness.] Blindness was inflicted on Epizelus, according to the legend, by the near presence of the angelic warrior at Marathon (Herod. vi. 117). Here, however, the blindness is probably intended to have followed from the flashes of lightning.

31. there were slain . . . twenty thousand and five hundred.] An unusual affectation of exactness. The writer may have begun to suspect that he will not be believed, if he always makes the number of those slain in a battle exactly 20,000 (ch. viii. 30; x. 17, 23).

32. a very strong hold, called Gazara.] Not the "Gazara" of 1 Macc. xiii. 53; xiv. 34; xvi. 1, 19, 20, which was in the Shefélah, six miles east of Ekron (see the comment on 1 Macc. iv. 15), but the "Jazer," or Gazara, of the Transjordanic region, which was twelve or thirteen miles north of Heshbon, in the country assigned to Gad by Moses (Num. xxxii. 35). Compare 1 Macc. v. 8, and the comment ad loc.

where Chereas was governor.] Chereas, or

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163. 33 But they that were with Maccabeus laid siege against the fortress courageously four days.

34 And they that were within, trusting to the strength of the place, blasphemed exceedingly, and uttered wicked words.

35 Nevertheless upon the fifth day early twenty young men of Maccabeus' company, inflamed with anger because of the blasphemies, assaulted the wall manly, and with a fierce courage killed all that they met withal.

36 Others likewise ascending after them, whiles they were busied with them that were within, burnt the towers, and kindling fires burnt the blasphemers alive; and others broke open the gates, and, having received in the rest of the army, took the city, B. C. 163.

37 And killed Timotheus, that was hid in a certain pit, and Chereas his brother, with Apollophanes.

38 When this was done, they praised the Lord with psalms and thanksgiving, who had done so great things for Israel, and given them the victory.

CHAPTER XI.

3 Lysias, thinking to get Jerusalem, 8 is put to flight. 16 The letters of Lysias to the Jews: 22 of the king unto Lysias, 27 and to the Jews: 34 of the Romans to the Jews.

NOT long after this, Lysias the king's [a]protector and cousin, who also managed the affairs, took [a] Gr. tutor.

rather Chæreas, is said in v. 37 to have been a brother of Timotheus. He is known to us only through the present writer.

33. courageously.] Rather, "gladly," "joyfully"—confident, as it would seem, that the siege would not be a long one.

34. they that were within . . . blasphemed exceedingly.] I.e. defied the Jews and their God. (See 1 Macc. vii. 35, 38, 42.)

35. with a fierce courage.] Literally, "with a courage like that of wild beasts." The "blasphemies" of the besieged had lashed them into a fury, and made them more like wild beasts than men.

36. and kindling fires burnt the blasphemers alive.] Compare 1 Macc. v. 5, 44; x. 84, 85; and see the comment on 1 Macc. v. 44.

37. And killed Timotheus, that was hid in a certain pit.] Timotheus reappears as alive in ch. xii. 2, 18–24, and certainly survived the capture of Gazara. (See 1 Macc. v. 11–40.) He may have been found hid in a cistern—a usual place of concealment (2 Sam. xvii. 18; Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' iii. 8, § 1)—when the city fell, and have been made a prisoner; but he must have contrived to obtain his release, as he did also at a later period (2 Macc. xii. 25).

Chereas . . . Apollophanes.] Unknown persons, but for the present narrative. Chæreas was the commandant of the town (v. 32).

38. they praised the Lord.] Compare ch. viii. 27; ix. 7; xi. 9, &c. A formal service of thanksgiving, like a modern Te Deum after a victory, seems to be intended.

CHAPTER XI.

§ 4. First Campaign of Lysias against Judas.

1–12. The author of the First Book places this campaign in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, during the absence of the monarch in the eastern provinces (ch. v. 28–35); and with this agree the dates in vv. 21, 33, and 38 of the present chapter. We must therefore regard the writer of the Second Book as having misplaced the campaign by one or two years. It belongs to B.C. 165–4, Epiphanes not having died till B.C. 164–3. The two writers agree as to the locality of the campaign—Idumæa, and especially the region about Beth-zur; as to the great disproportion between the forces brought into the field on either side; and as to the complete discomfiture of the Syro-Macedonians. They differ chiefly in the details of the numbers engaged and slain. The author of the Second Book, or his authority, Jason of Cyrene, embellishes his narrative with an apparition (ἐπιφάνεια), and attaches to it an account of negotiations and treaties, whereof the author of the First Book knows nothing. This writer, on the other hand, professes to give (ch. iv. 30–33) the exact words of the prayer offered by Maccabæus before the battle.

1. Lysias the king's protector and cousin.] The true position and rank of Lysias is here for the first time acknowledged. He is no longer Λυσίας τις, "a certain Lysias" (ch. x. 11), but "the king's cousin"—no longer a "governor" whom the king has "set up," but his "protector" or "guardian." Unfortunately these acknowledgments are made at

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164. sore displeasure for the things that were done.

[a] 1 Mac. 4. 28. 2 [a]And when he had gathered about fourscore thousand with all the horsemen, he came against the Jews, thinking to make the city an habitation of the ‖Gentiles,

‖ Or, Grecians. 3 And to make a gain of the temple, as of the other chapels of the heathen, and to set the high priesthood to sale every year:

4 Not at all considering the power of God, but puffed up with his ten thousands of footmen, and his thousands of horsemen, and his fourscore elephants. B. C. cir. 164.

5 So he came to Judea, and drew near to Bethsura, which was a strong town, but distant from Jerusalem about five furlongs, and he laid sore siege unto it.

‖ Maccabeus and his company. 6 Now when ‖they that were with Maccabeus heard that he besieged the holds, they and all the people with lamentation and tears besought the Lord that he would send a good angel to deliver Israel.

a wrong date, before Lysias had entered on his office of "guardian."

took sore displeasure for the things that were done.] At the results of the Idumæan and Ammonite wars (ch. x. 14–37), according to the mind of the writer; at the failures of Nicanor and Gorgias in the campaign of B.C. 166–5, according to the author of the First Book. (See 1 Macc. iv. 26, 27.)

2. when he had gathered about fourscore thousand.] This is intended as an estimate of the footmen, whom the writer of the First Book reckons at 60,000 (1 Macc. iv. 28).

all the horsemen.] Five thousand, according to the same authority.

thinking to make the city an habitation of the Gentiles.] Literally, "of the Greeks." The campaign really fell at a time when the whole city was in possession of the Syro-Macedonians, before Judas had recovered any part of it. (See 1 Macc. iv. 28–59.) But our author imagined that it took place after the recovery, which, according to him, was a recovery of both "the temple and the city" (ch. x. 1). He could thus view Lysias as designing to put "the Greeks" once more in possession.

3. to make a gain of the temple.] In what way, is not clear. Perhaps by requiring an annual payment from those who worshipped in it.

as of the other chapels of the heathen.] Τεμένη should be translated "sacred precincts," not "chapels." (See the comment on 1 Macc. i. 47.)

to set the high priesthood to sale every year.] Jason had bought the high-priestly office of Epiphanes (ch. iv. 7, 8); and Menelaus had three years later done the same, outbidding Jason (ib. vv. 24–27). Lysias now, according to our author, conceived the design of holding an annual sale of the office. Fortunately for the Jewish nation, this extreme degradation was never reached.

4. his fourscore elephants.] This is a very improbable number. Antiochus the Great had but fifty-four elephants (Liv. xxxvii. 39) at Magnesia. Lysias, in his second expedition, had only twenty-two (2 Macc. xiii. 2), or at most thirty-two (1 Macc. vi. 30). Josephus, however, in one passage ('Bell. Jud.' i. 1, § 5), makes the elephants in the second expedition "eighty."

5. he . . . drew near to Bethsura.] Bethsura, or Beth-Zur, was at this time reckoned to Idumæa (1 Macc. iv. 29). It was a strong place, occupying a commanding position, in the border country of Judæa and Edom. (See the comment on 1 Macc. iv. 29.)

distant from Jerusalem about five furlongs.] This is a mistake. The distance of Beit-Sur from Jerusalem is, at least, 160 furlongs. Two MSS. have σχοίνους for σταδίους, but our author habitually measures distances by stades (ch. xii. 9, 16, 17, 29), never by schœni.

he laid sore siege unto it.] Another mistake. Bethsura, at the time of Lysias's first expedition, was in the possession of the Idumæans, who were subject allies of the Syro-Macedonians. Lysias occupied it without any resistance (1 Macc. iv. 29).

6. when they that were with Maccabeus heard that he besieged the holds.] "He" refers to Lysias, whose (supposed) siege of Bethsura is looked upon as the beginning of a systematic attack upon, and occupation of, all the strongholds.

they . . . besought the Lord that he would send a good angel.] God had promised to "send an angel" before Israel to bring them safely into Canaan (Ex. xxiii. 20, 23; xxxii. 34; xxxiii. 2); and, more generally, to "give his angels charge over the righteous, to keep them in all their ways" (Ps. xci. 11; comp. Ps. xxxiv. 7). He had also, on various occasions (Josh. v. 13–15; Judg. vi. 11–23, xiii. 3–20; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 17; 2 Kings vi. 17), allowed the angels, who are His ministers, visibly to appear to His servants. It was thus natural that pious Israelites should in times

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164.

7 Then Maccabeus himself first of all took weapons, exhorting the other that they would jeopard themselves together with him to help their brethren: so they went forth together with a willing mind.

8 And as they were at Jerusalem, [b] there appeared before them on horseback one in white clothing, shaking his armour of gold.

[b] ch. 2. 21. & 10. 29.

9 Then they praised the merciful God all together, and took heart, insomuch that they were ready not only to fight with men, but with most cruel beasts, and to pierce through walls of iron.

10 Thus they marched forward in their armour, having an helper from heaven: for the Lord was merciful unto them.

B. C. cir. 164.

11 And giving a charge upon their enemies like lions, they slew eleven thousand footmen, and sixteen hundred horsemen, and put all the others to flight.

12 Many of them also being wounded escaped naked; and Lysias himself fled away shamefully, and so escaped.

13 Who, as he was a man of understanding, casting with himself what loss he had had, and considering that the Hebrews could not be overcome, because the Almighty of danger put up such a petition as that recorded in the text, not necessarily meaning to ask for a visible angelic manifestation, but only for the promised angelic aid, which might be given either visibly or invisibly. It is the author's belief that, on this occasion, as on many others in the course of the Maccabæan struggle, the aid was given visibly. (See ch. iii. 25, 26, 33, 34; x. 29, 30.)

7. to help their brethren.] Besieged, as the writer supposes, in Bethsura. (See vv. 5, 6.)

8. And as they were at Jerusalem.] Rather, "And there, while they were at Jerusalem." Judas and his army are regarded as having their head-quarters at Jerusalem, which was really not yet recovered. (See the comment on v. 2.)

there appeared before them on horseback.] Compare the apparitions in chs. iii. and x.

one in white clothing.] White symbolised purity. Hence the garments of the Levitical priests were almost wholly white (Ex. xxviii. 40–43), even those of the High Priest ordinarily. Angels have white raiment (Ezek. ix. 2; Matt. xxviii. 3; Mark xvi. 5; Luke xxiv. 4; John xx. 12; Acts i. 10, x. 30), and saints in the glorified state (Rev. iii. 4, 5; iv. 4; vi. 11; vii. 9, 14, &c.). So our Lord at His transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 2).

shaking his armour of gold.] Literally, "his panoply." "Panoply" is used by our author, in its etymological sense, for all the arms, both offensive and defensive, that a warrior wears. Here he is thinking especially of the shield and spear (or sword) in the two hands of the angel, which he "shook" as he led the way.

9. to pierce through walls of iron.] I.e. "walls however strong." (Compare Jer. i. 18; xv. 20.) The expression was almost proverbial.

10. they marched forward in their armour.] Rather, "in preparation for battle."

having an helper from heaven.] Rather, "having (with them) their helper from heaven."

11. like lions.] Compare 1 Macc. iii. 4, and the comment ad loc.

they slew eleven thousand footmen and sixteen hundred horsemen.] The Syro-Macedonian loss, according to the author of the First Book (1 Macc. iv. 34), was "about five thousand"—a far more probable number.

12. Many of them also being wounded.] Rather, "of these the greater part being wounded."

escaped naked.] I.e. "without their arms," having thrown them away.

§ 5. TERMS OF PEACE AGREED UPON BETWEEN JUDAS AND LYSIAS.

13–15. According to the author of the First Book, Lysias was so far from entertaining thoughts of peace in his heart at this time, that on his return to Antioch he immediately set to work to hire a vast number of mercenaries, with the object of invading Judæa as soon as possible with an army more numerous than the defeated one (1 Macc. iv. 35). The present writer has apparently confused the first expedition of Lysias with the second, at the end of which peace was actually concluded (ibid. vi. 55–61); or else he has been misled by the documents which he appends (v. 16–38), which he believed to be genuine and to belong to this year.

13. as he was a man of understanding.] Literally, "as he was not without intelligence"—an instance of meiosis.

what loss he had had.] Rather, "the defeat which he had suffered."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 164. God helped them, he sent unto them,

14 And persuaded them to agree to all reasonable conditions, and [c] promised that he would persuade the king that he must needs be a friend unto them.

[c] 1 Mac. 6. 58, 59, 60.

15 Then Maccabeus consented to all that Lysias desired, being careful of the common good; and whatsoever Maccabeus wrote unto Lysias concerning the Jews, the king granted it.

16 For there were letters written unto the Jews from Lysias to this effect: Lysias unto the people of the Jews sendeth greeting:

B. C. cir. 163.

17 John and Absalon, who were sent from you, delivered me the petition subscribed, and made request for the performance of the contents thereof.

18 Therefore what things soever were meet to be reported to the king, I have declared them, and he hath granted as much as might be.

because the Almighty God helped them.] Lysias is scarcely likely to have been actuated by a religious motive. He may have thought that the God of the Hebrews was a protector not to be despised; but it is more probable that he put aside altogether the religious aspect of the matter, and merely viewed the Jews as a brave and determined mountain people, whom it was very difficult to subdue. Still, he looked to succeed, if he could collect a larger and a better army (1 Macc. iv. 35).

14. persuaded them to agree to all reasonable conditions.] Rather, "persuaded them to make peace upon perfectly just conditions."

that he must needs be a friend unto them.] The Greek idiom will not permit of this translation. Ἀναγκάζειν is "to compel," and βασιλέα must be its object, not its subject. Lysias promised either to persuade or to compel the king to be their friend. One of the two verbs is redundant, and is probably a gloss, suggested by a scribe, who thought to improve upon his author.

15. whatsoever Maccabeus wrote unto Lysias concerning the Jews.] Maccabæus is supposed to have accepted the proposal of Lysias, and then to have represented to him what he thought must be understood by the phrase "upon perfectly just conditions" (ἐπὶ πᾶσι δικαίοις). Eupator, according to our author, accepted the interpretation of Maccabæus.

the king granted it.] Eupator is viewed by our author as in full possession of the kingly power. (See above, ch. x. 11, 13; xi. 18, 22–33.)

§ 6. LETTER OF LYSIAS TO THE JEWS.

16–21. This letter is clearly unsuitable to the time when Lysias had just suffered a severe defeat (vv. 11, 12). But it may well be a misdated document of the year B.C. 163–2, when Lysias's career of victory was stopped by intelligence of Philip's occupation of Antioch (1 Macc. vi. 55), and he patched up a hasty peace with the Jews (ibid. vv. 58–61). Its form and language, setting aside the date, are unexceptionable.

16. For there were letters written.] Rather, "For the letter, which was written to the Jews from Lysias, was to this effect."

Lysias unto the people of the Jews.] Compare 1 Macc. x. 25. The Syro-Macedonians had not yet acknowledged any right or authority as belonging to the Jewish leaders. Alexander Balas was the first to make such recognition, when he addressed Jonathan as "his brother" (ibid. v. 18).

17. John and Absalon.] "John" may have been the brother of Maccabæus, whom the writer has hitherto, by mistake, called Joseph (ch. viii. 22; x. 19). "Absalon" is not elsewhere mentioned. A forger would scarcely have invented, without necessity, two names.

delivered me the petition subscribed.] The "petition" is probably the document which Judas sent to Lysias, summing up what he considered to be the just claims of the Jews. (See the comment on v. 15.) It was "subscribed," i.e. appended to Lysias's letter, as sent, though not reported by our author. (Compare ch. ix. 25.)

made request for the performance of the contents thereof.] Rather, "made inquiry concerning the contents thereof;" i.e. asked whether the claims of the Jews, as stated by Judas, were allowed or no.

18. what things soever were meet to be reported to the king.] Some reference to Eupator had, no doubt, to be made, at any rate as a formality. (See 1 Macc. vi. 60, 61.) But it was probably Lysias himself who determined which of the Jews' demands were, and which were not, admissible.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

19 If then ye will keep yourselves loyal to the state, hereafter also will I endeavour to be a means of your good.

20 But of the particulars I have given order both to these, and the other that came from me, to commune with you.

21 Fare ye well. The hundred and eight and fortieth year, the four and twentieth day of the month ‖Dioscorinthius.

‖ Or, Dioscorus.

22 Now the king's letter contained these words: King Antiochus unto his brother Lysias sendeth greeting:

23 Since our father is translated unto the gods, our will is, that they that are in our realm live quietly, that every one may attend upon his own affairs.

B. C. cir. 163.

24 We understand also that the Jews would not consent to our father, for to be brought unto the custom of the Gentiles, but had rather keep their own manner of living: for the which cause they require of us, that we should suffer them to live after their own laws.

25 Wherefore our mind is, that this nation shall be in rest, and we have determined to restore them their temple, that they may live and the other that came from me.] Rather, "the others that come from me"—i.e. the envoys whom I am now sending to you.

20. both to these.] I.e. to the Jewish envoys, John and Absalon.

to commune with you.] Or "hold a discussion with you." Small matters of detail were to be settled between the Jewish authorities at Jerusalem and envoys whom Lysias sent to convey his letter.

21. The hundred and eight and fortieth year.] It has been already noticed (see the comment on vv. 1–12) that this was the year before the death of Epiphanes, which fell in the 149th year of the Seleucid era, B.C. 164–3. The expedition of Lysias, which terminated in a peace, fell into the 150th year (1 Macc. vi. 20; vii. 1), or B.C. 163–2. The present date is one year too late for the first, and two years too early for the second, expedition of Lysias.

the month Dioscorinthius.] No such month was known to the Greeks. There was a Macedonian month, Dius, the sixth of the year, corresponding nearly to our March, and a Cretan month, Dioscurus, which fell at the same time. But a month called Dioscorinthius is wholly unknown to the ancients. Our author has fallen into a mistake.

§ 7. Supposed Letter of Eupator to Lysias.

22–26. The genuineness of this letter is generally disallowed. In the first expedition of Lysias, he could hold no communication with the king, who was absent in Persia. In the second, letters were out of place, since the king was in the same camp with Lysias (1 Macc. vi. 28, 33, 47, 50, 57, &c.). The letter itself contains also inappropriate expressions, and at least one untrue statement.

22. King Antiochus unto his brother Lysias.] It is inconceivable that either Epiphanes or Eupator should have addressed Lysias as his "brother." As "cousin" expresses equality of rank among modern European sovereigns, so did "brother" among the Asiatics. (See 1 Macc. x. 18, and compare 1 Kings xx. 32.) Lysias was a subject, and, though of the blood royal, would certainly not have been addressed as "brother" even by Eupator.

23. Since our father is translated unto the gods.] One Seleucid monarch (Antiochus I.) had taken the title of Θεός during his lifetime, and there is reason to believe that all were, more or less, objects of worship, at least to some of their subjects. Eupator might thus perhaps assume the apotheosis of his father after death.

they that are in our realm.] Rather, "of our realm," i.e. dependent upon it.

24. the custom of the Gentiles.] Rather, "of the Greeks." Compare 1 Macc. i. 54–59, ii. 15–18; 2 Macc. iv. 9–15, &c.; and for a similar mistranslation, see v. 2.

they require of us, that we should suffer them to live after their own laws.] This was, beyond a doubt, the main requirement made by Judas in his letter to Lysias (v. 15). Its concession by Lysias and Eupator is vouched for by the author of the First Book (1 Macc. vi. 59–61).

25. we have determined to restore them their temple.] The Syro-Macedonians never "restored their temple" to the Jews. Maccabæus recovered it by force of arms in B.C. 165–4, and from that time it remained continuously in the possession of the patriotic party. It is inconceivable that Eupator should have made the misstatement here ascribed to him.

that they may live according to the customs

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

according to the customs of their forefathers.

26 Thou shalt do well therefore to send unto them, and ‖ grant them peace, that when they are certified of our mind, they may be of good comfort, and ever go cheerfully about their own affairs.

‖ Or, give them assurance.

27 And the letter of the king unto the nation of the Jews was after this manner: King Antiochus sendeth greeting unto the council, and the rest of the Jews:

28 If ye fare well, we have our desire; we are also in good health.

29 Menelaus declared unto us, that your desire was to return home, and to follow your own business:

30 Wherefore they that will depart shall have safe conduct till the thirtieth day of Xanthicus with security.

B. C. cir. 163.

31 And the Jews shall use their own kind of meats and laws, as before; and none of them any manner of ways shall be molested for things ignorantly done.

32 I have sent also Menelaus, that he may comfort you.

33 Fare ye well. In the hundred forty and eighth year, and the fifteenth day of the month ‖ Xanthicus.

‖ Or, April.

34 The Romans also sent unto them a letter containing these words: Quintus Memmius and Titus Man-of their forefathers.] This was, in fact, one of the main conditions of the peace of B.C. 163–2. (See 1 Macc. vi. 59.)

§ 8. Supposed Letter of Eupator to the Jews.

27–33. Again, the genuineness of the document is suspected. Eupator was not in a position to write letters of any binding authority. He had only to give a formal assent to the terms which Lysias proposed. Suspicious points of detail in the letter are: 1, the employment of Menelaus as their ambassador by the Jews; 2, the Latin character of the opening salutation; 3, the permission to depart under safe conduct during fifteen days; 4, the date. five months after the letter of Lysias to the Jews.

27. unto the council.] Or "the senate." (See 1 Macc. xii. 6; 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44.)

28. If ye fare well, &c.] Compare ch. ix. 20, and the comment ad loc.

29. Menelaus declared unto us.] Grimm assumes that this "Menelaus" is not the High Priest of ch. iv. 23-50; v. 5, 15, 23, but some entirely different person, otherwise unknown. But it is far more probable that our author, or the inventor of the letter, whoever he was, intended the High Priest, the only known Menelaus of the day. The Jews, however, can scarcely have in fact employed so bitter an adversary as their ambassador.

30. they that will depart shall have safe conduct.] This permission in no wise suits the circumstances of either expedition of Lysias. In both, the Syro-Macedonians took a hasty departure, leaving the Jews to themselves. The Jews had on neither occasion any reason to wish to "depart," nor any need of "safe conduct" if they departed.

the thirtieth day of Xanthicus.] "Xanthicus" was the sixth Macedonian month, and corresponded nearly with the Jewish Nisan. It was the fifth month after Dius, which corresponded with Marchesvan.

31. the Jews shall use their own kind of meats.] Literally, "of expenses" (see Bel and the Dragon, v. 8); but "meats" are no doubt intended. (Compare Polyb. ix. 42, § 4.)

for things ignorantly done.] I.e. for infractions of the law through ignorance or accident. (Compare 1 Macc. xiii. 39.)

33. the fifteenth day of the month Xanthicus.] Nearly five months after the date of the letter of Lysias (supra, v. 21). The concocter of the letter has supposed Eupator to be at Antioch, Lysias in Judæa, and has therefore taken care to put an interval between the letters. But the interval is in any case too long, and Eupator was really in Judæa with Lysias (1 Macc. vi. 57–63).

§ 9. Supposed Letter of two Roman Commissioners to the Jews.

34–38. This fourth document is a manifest forgery. Judas had not as yet entered into communication with the Romans (1 Macc. viii. 17–32); nor did he do so till after the landing of Demetrius and the death of Nicanor (ibid. vii. 47; ix. 1). Moreover, neither of the two names given is found among the legati of Rome in Asia at the period.

34. Quintus Memmius.] The Memmii were a respectable Roman family of the time

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 163. lius, ‖ambassadors of the Romans, send greeting unto the people of the Jews.

‖ Or, consuls.

35 Whatsoever Lysias the king's cousin hath granted, therewith we also are well pleased.

36 But touching such things as he judged to be referred to the king, after ye have advised thereof, send one forthwith, that we may declare as it is convenient for you: for we are now going to Antioch.

37 Therefore send some with speed, that we may know what is your mind.

38 Farewell. This hundred and eight and fortieth year, the fifteenth day of the month Xanthicus. B. C. cir. 163.

CHAPTER XII.

1 The king's lieutenants vex the Jews. 3 They of Joppe drown two hundred Jews. 6 Judas is avenged upon them. 11 He maketh peace with the Arabians, 16 and taketh Caspis. 22 Timotheus' armies overthrown.

WHEN these covenants were made, Lysias went unto the king, and the Jews were about their husbandry.

2 But of the governors of several places, [a] Timotheus, and Apollonius the son of Genneus, also Hieronymus, and Demophon, and beside them Nicanor the governor of Cyprus, cir. 163. [a] See ch. 10. 37.

(Liv. xli. 25; xliii. 5, &c.); but no Quintus Memmius is found, nor any Memmius at all among the commissioners sent into Asia. These are:

C. Sulpicius	in B.C. 165
Ma. Sergius	— — —
Cn. Octavius	— — —
Sp. Lucretius	— — —
L. Aurelius	— — —
Tib. Gracchus	— — 163
L. Lentulus	— — —
Servilius Glaucia	— — —

Titus Manlius.] A "Titus Manlius Torquatus" was Roman commissioner in Egypt in B.C. 163; but his colleague was Cneius Merula (Polyb. xxxi. 18, § 9); and he had no authority in Asia.

ambassadors of the Romans.] Rather, "commissioners." The Roman legati of this period were representatives of the republic, empowered to act very much as they pleased for the purpose of advancing Roman interests in the quarter to which they were sent. They had more practical functions, and far more freedom of action, than ambassadors ordinarily possess.

36. touching such things as he judged to be referred to the king.] See above, v. 18.

38. the fifteenth day of the month Xanthicus.] This letter is very improbably dated on the same day as that of Eupator (v. 33), nearly five months after that of Lysias (v. 21). If an authentic document, it would naturally have followed close upon Lysias's letter, on which it is a comment. An interval would then have occurred, during which Roman influence would have been used, and then Eupator would have announced his final decision. As it is, the Jews are asked to consult together, and to inform the Romans of their wishes after the final decision has been taken.

CHAPTER XII.

§ 10. The Jews vexed by the Provincial Commandants. Judas attacks Joppa and Jamnia.

1–9. According to our author, though peace had been made between Judas on the one hand, and Lysias and Eupator on the other, yet hostilities continued between the Jews and the provincial commandants. Particular captains and particular towns set themselves to vex and harass the obnoxious nation, which, while living in their midst, conformed to none of their usages, but maintained pertinaciously its own religion and its own customs. Among the towns which shewed the most violent hostility were Joppa and Jamnia, the latter contemplating, and the former executing, a treacherous outrage, and thus calling down on themselves the vengeance of Judas, who burnt the havens of the two towns.

1. Lysias went unto the king.] See the comment on ch. xi. 33.

2. the governors of several places.] Rather, "the commandants" (στρατηγοὶ, not ἐπιστάται).

Timotheus.] This is probably the same leader who is mentioned as an adversary of the Jews in ch. viii. 30–32, and ch. x. 24–37. In the latter place our author has wrongly represented him as slain. (See the comment on ch. x. 37.)

Apollonius the son of Genneus.] The epithet, "son of Genneus," distinguishes this Apollonius from two others—the "son of Thraseas," mentioned in ch. iii. 5, iv. 4, &c.; and the "son of Menestheus," mentioned in ch. iv. 21.

Nicanor the governor of Cyprus.] Rather, "the Cypriarch"—probably the highest reli-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. would not suffer them to be quiet, and live in peace.

3 The men of Joppe also did such an ungodly deed: they prayed the Jews that dwelt among them to go with their wives and children into the boats which they had prepared, as though they had meant them no hurt.

4 Who accepted of it according to the common decree of the city, as being desirous to live in peace, and suspecting nothing: but when they were gone forth into the deep, they drowned no less than two hundred of them.

5 When Judas heard of this cruelty done unto his countrymen, he commanded those that were with him to make them ready.

6 And calling upon God the righteous Judge, he came against those murderers of his brethren, and burnt the haven by night, and set the boats on fire, and those that fled thither he slew. B. C. cir. 163.

7 And when the town was shut up, he went backward, ‖as if he would return to root out all them of the city of Joppe. ‖ Or, with a purpose to return.

8 But when he heard that the Jamnites were minded to do in like manner unto the Jews that dwelt among them,

9 He came upon the Jamnites also by night, and set fire on the haven and the navy, so that the light of the fire was seen at Jerusalem two hundred and forty furlongs off.

gious official in Cyprus during the time that Antiochus Epiphanes held the island, Crates having been the civil governor (ch. iv. 29). Compare the terms "Asiarch" (Acts xix. 31), "Syriarch," &c. This "Nicanor" is most likely a different person from "the son of Patroclus," mentioned in ch. viii. 9–24, 34, 35; xiv. 12–39; xv. 1–37.

3. The men of Joppe.] Joppa was at this time in the possession of the Syro-Macedonians, who maintained a garrison there (1 Macc. x. 75). The inhabitants were of mixed race, in part Jewish, in part Syrian, probably also in part Greco-Macedonian. In the present passage, the non-Jewish element is spoken of as preponderating, the Jewish as a sort of colony of foreign settlers. (Compare 1 Macc. xiv. 34.)

did such an ungodly deed.] Rather, "did the following ungodly deed."

4. Who accepted of it according to the common decree of the city.] These words shew that the massacre was not the private act of certain irresponsible persons, but was publicly determined on by the State. The Jews must have at first misdoubted the offer made to them, and have hesitated to accept it; whereupon a formal decree was passed to reassure them; and it was in reliance on this public act of the people that they embarked and met their doom. We cannot be surprised that Judas visited such a treachery with extreme severity (v. 6).

6. calling upon God the righteous Judge.] Compare Gen. xviii. 25; Ps. vii. 11; 2 Tim. iv. 8.

he . . . burnt the haven by night.] I.e. whatever was inflammable in it, as docks, wooden piers, landing-places, &c.

he slew.] Or, "put to the sword."

7. when the town was shut up.] I.e. "when he found that the gates of the town were closed, and that it could not be taken by surprise during the night."

as if he would return.] Rather, "intending to come again."

8. the Jamnites.] The inhabitants of Jamnia. On the position of Jamnia, see the comment on 1 Macc. iv. 15; and, on its importance, compare 1 Macc. v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40, with Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 8, § 6; 'Bell. Jud.' ii. 18.

were minded to do in like manner.] Not, probably, to drown them treacherously—a plan which could scarcely prove successful twice—but to massacre them in one way or another. On the massacres of Jews in towns where they formed a minority of the population, see Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xviii. 9, §§ 8, 9.

9. two hundred and forty furlongs.] Yebna, the modern representative of Jamnia, is about 28 miles from Jerusalem, or 243 stades. The port is distant from the town about two miles, or 17 stades, more, making a total of 260 stades. The conflagration must have been very great to have been seen from such a distance.

§ 12. A BODY OF ARABS ATTACKS JUDAS, AND IS DEFEATED. HE MAKES PEACE WITH THEM.

10–12. It has been suggested that this is a variant account of the transactions related in 1 Macc. v. 37–39 (Grimm); but the scene of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

10 Now when they were gone from thence nine furlongs in their journey toward Timotheus, no fewer than five thousand men on foot and five hundred horsemen of the Arabians set upon him.

11 Whereupon there was a very sore battle; but Judas' side by the help of God got the victory; so that the Nomades of Arabia, being overcome, besought Judas for peace, promising both to give him cattle, and to pleasure him otherwise.

12 Then Judas, thinking indeed that they would be profitable in many things, granted them peace: whereupon they shook hands, and so they ‖departed to their tents.

‖ Or, went from place to place with their families and cattle.

13 He went also about to make a bridge to a certain strong city, which was fenced about with walls, and inhabited by people of divers countries; and the name of it was Caspis.

B. C. cir. 163.

14 But they that were within it put such trust in the strength of the walls and provision of victuals, that they behaved themselves rudely toward them that were with Judas, railing and blaspheming, and uttering such words as were not to be spoken.

15 Wherefore Judas with his company, calling upon the great Lord of the world, [b]who without any rams or engines of war did cast that encounter is the Transjordanic region, while the battle here mentioned took place little more than a mile from Jamnia. Wandering Arabs might be met with in almost any part of southern or eastern Palestine, and would be apt to attack any force to which they thought themselves superior. There is no evidence that these Arabs were in league with Timotheus.

[b] Josh. 6. 20.

10. in their journey toward Timotheus.] Having punished Joppa and Jamnia, Judas next proceeded against this powerful captain, the chief of the commandants left by Lysias to maintain the authority of Eupator in Palestine. (See v. 2.) He had, apparently, betaken himself to the Transjordanic territory, and was greatly harassing the Jews in those parts (1 Macc. v. 6, 11, 34, 40).

five thousand men on foot.] That the 5,000 were "men on foot" is not expressed, but is gathered from the context, and from the practice of the author to omit πεζοὶ in his estimates of the numbers of an army. (See ch. x. 31; xi. 2, 11.)

11. Whereupon there was a very sore battle.] Rather, "a stout fight." If Judas had, as appears from 1 Macc. v. 20, eight thousand men with him, it might have been expected that he would have gained an easy victory. But Arab troops often fight with desperation, even against superior numbers.

promising . . . to give him cattle.] Almost the whole wealth of the nomadic Arabs consists in cattle. Tributary Arab tribes paid their tribute in beasts (2 Chr. xvii. 11; G. Smith, 'History of Asshur-bani-pal,' pp. 287, 288).

12. they shook hands.] Rather, "they joined hands;" i.e. pledged their faith to each other, by each grasping the other's right hand.

§ 13. JUDAS BESIEGES AND TAKES CASPIN.

13–16. The "Caspis" or "Caspin" of this passage is probably the "Casphon" of 1 Macc. v. 36, which was a strong city of the Transjordanic region, and is probably identified with Heshbon. The details here given are exegetical of the brief statement in the passage above quoted, that "Judas took Casphon."

13. He went also about to make a bridge.] It has been proposed to read γεφύραις for γεφυροῦν, and to translate (with the Vulgate) "a city strong through bridges" (Grimm). But there is no need of any change. If the city was protected by a deep moat or by ravines, Judas may have designed to make his approaches by means of a mound of earth carried across the obstacle. Γεφύραις would not readily pass into γεφυροῦν.

inhabited by people of divers countries.] The population was very mixed in the Transjordanic region. Amorites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Arabs were intermingled throughout the territory, which contained also a large number of Jews. (Compare 1 Macc. v. 9, 25, 39, 45.) There was also, no doubt, a sprinkling of Syro-Macedonians.

the name of it was Caspis.] The Vulgate has "Caspin;" and the Greek admits of this rendering. (Compare the "Casphon" of 1 Macc. v. 36.)

14. behaved themselves rudely.] Literally, "somewhat rudely."

15. calling upon the great Lord of the world.] Literally, "the great Dynast,"—i.e.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. down Jericho in the time of Joshua, gave a fierce assault against the walls, 16 And took the city by the will of God, and made unspeakable slaughters, insomuch that a lake two furlongs broad near adjoining thereunto, being filled full, was seen running with blood.

17 Then departed they from thence seven hundred and fifty furlongs, and came to Characa unto the Jews that are called Tubieni. B. C. cir. 163.

18 But as for Timotheus, they found him not in the places: for before he had dispatched any thing, he departed from thence, having left a very strong garrison in a certain hold.

19 Howbeit Dositheus and Sosipater, who were of Maccabeus' captains, went forth, and slew those that the sovereign ruler of the universe. The expression used is a rare one.

without any rams.] The battering-ram was employed by the Assyrians as early as the time of Asshur-nazir-pal (B.C. 880). The Greeks used it in the Peloponnesian war (Thucyd. ii. 76); and the Macedonians employed it with great effect from the time of Philip. By the Greeks and Romans the head of the implement was actually fashioned in the shape of a ram's head, whence the names κριός and aries.

engines of war.] Other "engines of war" known to the ancients were the balista, which hurled stones; the catapult, which threw darts; and the helepolis, which was a complicated machine of great size, combining the several engines already mentioned.

did cast down Jericho.] See Josh. vi. 20.

gave a fierce assault.] Literally, "rushed against the walls like wild beasts." Compare ch. x. 35, where a similar expression is used. In both cases the soldiers of Judas are represented as lashed into fury by the "blasphemies" of their adversaries.

16. a lake two furlongs broad.] There is a large reservoir near Heshbon, towards the south, a few yards from the base of the hill (Burckhardt, 'Travels in Syria,' p. 365), which seems to be alluded to in Cant. vii. 4, and which may have been the original basis of this "lake two stades broad." The description is marked by our author's vice of exaggeration.

§ 14. EXPEDITION OF JUDAS AGAINST CHARAX. DEFEAT OF TIMOTHEUS, WHO IS ALLOWED BY DOSITHEUS AND SOSIPATER TO ESCAPE.

17–25. The expedition against Charax for the relief of the Jews called "Tubieni," is omitted by the author of the First Book, who however mentions the sufferings of certain "brethren" who dwelt "in the places of Tobie" (1 Macc. v. 13). The defeat of Timotheus here given with some detail seems to be that mentioned by the author of the First Book in ch. v. 37–43. Our author, as usual, exaggerates the numbers of the troops engaged, and of the slain (vv. 19, 20, 23).

17. seven hundred and fifty furlongs.] This is a distance of somewhat over 86 miles, and is quite incompatible with the "Charax" intended being "Charax-Moab," or Karak, since that place is less than forty miles from Heshbon. Some other "Charax" must be sought for, in a northerly direction (where lay the "land of Tob"), not very far from Ashtoreth-Karnaim (v. 26). Charax, "palisaded camp," is a name which may well have belonged to many distinct localities.

to Characa.] Rather, "to Charax." "Characa" is merely the accusative case of the word.

the Jews that are called Tubieni.] Compare 1 Macc. v. 13. The "Tubieni"—"men of Tub"—correspond to the Ish-Tob, "men of Tob," mentioned in 2 Sam. x. 6, 8. Their country, the "land of Tob" (Judg. xi. 3), was a portion of Gilead, probably towards the north-west.

18. as for Timotheus.] See above, v. 10. Judas had set out from Jamnia with the intention of engaging the army of Timotheus.

they found him not in the places.] He was neither at Caspin nor at Charax.

for before he had dispatched any thing.] Rather, "for having failed to accomplish anything." The word ἄπρακτος conveys the idea of an attempt which had ended in failure.

he departed.] Rather, "he had departed." He had quitted Charax before Judas and his army arrived.

19. Dositheus and Sosipater.] The prevalence of Grecian names, even among the chief officers of Judas, is an indication of the extent to which the Hellenizing mania had affected even the soundest part of the nation. (Compare 1 Macc. viii. 17.)

who were of Maccabeus' captains.] Judas did not allow himself to be diverted from the

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. Timotheus had left in the fortress, above ten thousand men.

20 And Maccabeus ranged his army by bands, and set ‖ them over the bands, and went against Timotheus, who had about him an hundred and twenty thousand men of foot, and two thousand and five hundred horsemen.

‖ Dositheus and Sosipater.

21 Now when Timotheus had knowledge of Judas' coming, he sent the women and children and the other baggage unto a fortress called [c] Carnion: for the town was hard to besiege, and uneasy to come unto, by reason of the straitness of all the places.

[c] 1 Mac. 5. 43, Carnaim.

22 But when Judas his first band came in sight, the enemies, being smitten with fear and terror through the appearing of him that seeth all things, fled amain, one running this way, another that way, so as that they were often hurt of their own men, and wounded with the points of their own swords.

B. C. cir. 163.

23 Judas also was very earnest in pursuing them, killing those wicked wretches, of whom he slew about thirty thousand men.

24 Moreover Timotheus himself fell into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater, whom he besought with much craft to let him go with his life, because he had many of the Jews' parents, and the brethren of some of them, who, if they put him to death, should not be regarded.

25 So when he had assured them with many words that he would restore them without hurt, according to the agreement, they let him go for the saving of their brethren.

pursuit of Timotheus by the garrison which that commander had left behind him to threaten Charax, but, detaching a force under two of his principal officers to attack the garrison in its stronghold, himself pressed forward against the main army and the chief commander. (See v. 20.)

20. set them over the bands.] Rather, as in the Syriac, "set captains over the bands." Αὐτοὺς is a wrong reading, and should be changed into τούς.

an hundred and twenty thousand men of foot.] This is a very improbable number. The highest estimate of footmen elsewhere, even in a royal Syro-Macedonian army, is 110,000 (2 Macc. xiii. 2), which the author of the First Book reduces to 100,000 (1 Macc. vi. 30). It is therefore quite inconceivable that a mere "commandant" (see v. 2) should have collected 120,000. All the numbers in this chapter are greatly exaggerated. (See vv. 19, 23, 26, 28, &c.)

21. a fortress called Carnion.] The subsequent mention of the "temple of Atargatis" at Carnion (v. 26) identifies this place with the "Carnaim" of the First Book (1 Macc. v. 26, 43), which is generally allowed to be the "Ashtoreth-Karnaim" of Gen. xiv. 5. On the probable site, see the comment on 1 Macc. v. 26.

uneasy to come unto.] Guarded, as we learn from the First Book (1 Macc. v. 39–43), by a deep ravine or watercourse, dry in the summer time, which had to be crossed before an attack could be made on the fortress.

22. Judas his first band.] Compare v. 20. Judas had divided his troops into several "bands."

through the appearing of him that seeth all things.] A miraculous manifestation of the Divine presence is clearly intended, on a par with those mentioned in chs. iii. 25, 33; x. 29; xi. 8; xv. 27. The author of the First Book, though he mentions the battle (1 Macc. v. 43), says nothing of any such manifestation.

24. Timotheus . . . fell into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater.] This is not stated in the First Book, and is, apparently, disbelieved by Ewald and Dean Stanley, who say nothing of it. But the tale is not one which it would have been worth while to invent; and it may fairly be regarded as one of our author's contributions to the history of the period.

with much craft.] Rather, "with much imposture." The author means that Timotheus invented the whole story of his having Jewish captives in his power, who would be ill-treated if he were put to death.

§ 15. CAPTURE OF THE ATARGATEUM AT CARNION—FALL OF EPHRON—RETURN OF JUDAS BY WAY OF SCYTHOPOLIS TO JERUSALEM.

26–31. This passage runs parallel with 1 Macc. v. 44–54, with which it agrees in all the main particulars. It adds the facts, that Lysias had a house in Ephron, and that the inhabitants of Scythopolis (Beth-shan) lived on friendly terms with the Jews of the vicinity.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163.

26 Then Maccabeus marched forth to Carnion, and to the temple of ‖Atargatis, and there he slew five and twenty thousand persons.

27 And after he had put to flight and destroyed them, Judas removed the host toward Ephron, a strong city, wherein Lysias abode, and a great multitude of divers nations, and the strong young men kept the walls, and defended them mightily: wherein also was great provision of engines and darts.

28 But when Judas and his company had called upon Almighty God, who with his power breaketh the strength of his enemies, they won the city, and slew twenty and five thousand of them that were within.

B. C. cir. 163.

29 From thence they departed to Scythopolis, which lieth six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem.

30 But when the Jews that dwelt there had testified that the Scythopolitans dealt lovingly with them, and entreated them kindly in the time of their adversity;

31 They gave them thanks, desiring them to be friendly still unto them: and so they came to Jerusalem, the feast of the weeks approaching.

Its estimates of the numbers slain by Judas are of the usual exaggerated character. (See the comment on v. 20.)

26. the temple of Atargatis.] The author of the First Book has "the holy precinct (τέμενος) in Carnaim" (ch. v. 43), which was evidently large enough to afford a camping-ground to the remnant of the defeated army. Atargatis, or Derketo (Derketis), was the great Syrian nature goddess (Dea Syra), corresponding to the Phœnician Ashtoreth and the Babylonian Ishtar or Nanæa. The chief seats of her worship were Hierapolis (Mabog) and Aphek or Aphaca. On its essential impurity, see Euseb. 'Vit. Constant.' iii. 56; Lucian, 'De Dea Syra,' §§ 4–10.

27. Ephron, a strong city.] On the identity of "Ephron" with Gephrun (Polyb. v. 70) and its probable position, see the comment on 1 Macc. v. 46.

wherein Lysias abode.] The writer does not intend to say that Lysias was in Ephron at the time of the siege, but that he had a house there, in which he sometimes resided. There is no improbability in this statement.

and a great multitude of divers nations.] Compare v. 13.

28. when Judas . . . had called upon Almighty God.] Literally, "upon the Dynast." Compare v. 15.

29. Scythopolis.] Called "Beth-shan" in 1 Macc. v. 52, as in Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27, and generally in the canonical Books of the Old Testament—"Scythopolis" only here and in Judith iii. 10. Anciently the city belonged to the Canaanites, and from them probably received its name of Beth-Shean or Beth-Shan. The name "Scythopolis" (Σκυθῶν πόλις) is first found given to it in Polybius (v. 70, § 4), who wrote about B.C. 140, and afterwards occurs as the regular Greco-Roman name in Strabo, Pliny, Eusebius, Josephus, and the Itineraries ('Itin. Ant.' p. 197; 'Itin. Hierosol.' p. 586), maintaining itself till the time of William of Tyre, after which the old name recurs in the form of Beisan. Scythopolis is thought to have derived its name from a settlement of Scythians at the spot, made perhaps at the time of the great Scythic invasion of Palestine mentioned by Herodotus (i. 106), which took place about B.C. 600. It was at all times more a heathen than a Jewish city (Judg. i. 27; Mishna 'Aboda Zara,' i. 4; Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' ii. 18, § 3, &c.).

six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem.] This estimate is fairly correct. Beisan is distant from Jerusalem, as the crow flies, nearly 500 stades, and could not be reached by any ordinary route without an augmentation of the distance by at least one-fifth.

30. the Scythopolitans dealt lovingly with them.] This was not so at a later date. On the breaking out of the last Roman war, A.D. 65, the heathen inhabitants rose up against their Jewish fellow-citizens, and massacred them to the number of 13,000 (Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' l. s. c.).

31. they came to Jerusalem.] Compare 1 Macc. v. 54. It is a new fact, contributed by the writer of this Book, that the return immediately preceded the Feast of Pentecost. On the appellation "Feast of Weeks," see Deut. xvi. 10, 16, and compare Lev. xxiii. 15, 16.

§ 16. EXPEDITION OF JUDAS INTO IDUMÆA. GORGIAS IS NEARLY CAPTURED. DEFEAT OF HIS ARMY.

32–37. The expedition touched on by the author of the First Book in ch. v. 65 is here

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 163.

32 And after the feast, called Pentecost, they went forth against Gorgias the governor of ‖Idumea, ‖ Or, Jamnia, 1 Mac. 5. 58.

33 Who came out with three thousand men of foot and four hundred horsemen.

34 And it happened that in their fighting together a few of the Jews were slain.

35 At which time Dositheus, one of Bacenor's company, who was on horseback, and a strong man, was still upon Gorgias, and taking hold of his coat drew him by force; and when he would have taken that cursed man alive, a horseman of Thracia coming upon him ‖smote off his shoulder, so that Gorgias fled unto Marisa.

B. C. cir. 163.

‖ Or, put by his arm: or, wounded him in the shoulder: or, struck him in the shoulder.

36 Now when they that were with ‖Gorgias had fought long, and were weary, Judas called upon the Lord, that he would shew himself to be their helper and leader of the battle.

‖ Or, Esdris.

37 And with that he began in his own language, and sung psalms with a loud voice, and rushing unawares upon Gorgias' men, he put them to flight.

given with some detail. It appears that Gorgias was the leader against whom Judas contended. Judas had only a small army (v. 33), and was in danger of suffering defeat, but by an appeal to the religious feeling of his troops gained the victory. In the struggle Gorgias was almost captured by Dositheus, but escaped through the latter being wounded. No mention is made of Hebron, which, according to the author of the First Book, was captured by Judas.

32. after the feast called Pentecost.] Compare Tobit ii. 1. The name is a translation of the Hebrew יוֹם חֲמִשִּׁים, which was given to the Festival because it fell on the fiftieth day after the Passover sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 15, 16).

Gorgias the governor of Idumea.] Gorgias has been already mentioned as in league with the Idumæans against Judas (ch. x. 14, 15). He had, shortly before this, inflicted a defeat on a body of Jews who had attacked Jamnia under Azarias and Joseph (1 Macc. v. 56–60). His command seems to have extended over Idumæa and northern Philistia.

33. Who came out with three thousand men.] This translation makes the estimate one of the army of Gorgias. But there can be little doubt that the author intends to give the numbers of the army of Judas. (See Grimm ad loc.) Gorgias's forces were probably far more numerous. Translate—"Now he came out with three thousand men."

35. Dositheus, one of Bacenor's company.] It would seem that this "Dositheus" is not the commander of vv. 19, 24, or he would not have been called "a certain Dositheus" (Δωσίθεός τις), "one of Bacenor's men." He was, apparently, a common soldier.

was still upon Gorgias.] Rather, "attached himself to Gorgias;" i.e. made a set upon him—challenged an encounter, and would not be denied.

taking hold of his coat.] Rather, "catching hold of his cloak." The chlamys was a sort of cloak or scarf, fastened round the neck, and hanging loosely behind the warrior. (See Smith's 'Dict. of Antiquities,' cuts on pp. 196, 275, 276, 519, &c.) It was easily caught hold of, and gave the man who seized it a grasp of his foe which was not easily escaped.

a horseman of Thracia coming upon him.] The Thracians were renowned as light-armed troops, and served both on foot and horseback. They were constantly enrolled as mercenaries by the Epigoni, or "successors" of Alexander, and are found serving in almost all the large armies collected by them (See Polyb. v. 65, § 10; 79, § 6, &c.)

smote off his shoulder.] I.e. his arm at the shoulder. (Compare ch. xv. 30.)

Gorgias fled unto Marisa.] "Marisa," the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew "Mareshah," was the name of a city of Judah situated in the low Philistine plain, or Shefêlah. It was distant from Hebron about thirteen miles to the north-west, on the direct route to Ashdod. It seems to be represented by the modern "Marash" (Robinson, 'Researches,' vol. ii. pp. 67, 68). The Syriac alteration of "Marisa" into "Samaria" is quite indefensible.

36. when they that were with Gorgias had fought long and were weary.] "Gorgias" is the reading of a few MSS. only; the great majority have "Esdris." A Jewish, and not a Syro-Macedonian, commander is certainly intended. Note that "Ezri" (= Esdris) occurs as a Jewish name in 1 Chr. xxvii. 26.

37. with that he began in his own language and sung psalms.] Rather, "with that he led off, in the national tongue, the war-cry that was joined with psalms." Some well-known war-song must be meant.

Gorgias' men.] The army which Gorgias had just deserted. (See v. 3 .)

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163.

38 So Judas gathered his host, and came into the city of Odollam. And when the seventh day came, they purified themselves, as the custom was, and kept the sabbath in the same place.

39 And upon the day following, Or, at such time, &c. ‖as the use had been, Judas and his company came to take up the bodies of them that were slain, and to bury them with their kinsmen in their fathers' graves.

40 Now under the coats of every one that was slain they found things consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites, which is forbidden the Jews by [d] the law. Then every man saw that this was the cause wherefore they were slain.

B. C. cir. 163.

[d] Deut. 7. 25, 26.

41 All men therefore praising the Lord, the righteous Judge, who had opened things that were hid,

42 Betook themselves unto prayer, and besought him that the sin committed might wholly be put out of remembrance. Besides, that noble

§ 17. Burial of the Jewish slain. Discovery of idol-offerings upon their persons. Atonement made for them.

38–45. Judas, after the battle, occupied "Odollam" or "Adullam," and there rested during the Sabbath. On the day following he proceeded to bury the bodies of those soldiers belonging to his own side who had fallen in the fight. According to our author, it was found that all the slain had, concealed on their persons, objects which had been carried off from the idol temples of Jamnia. Hence their deaths were regarded as Divine judgments. Judas, having improved the occasion to warn the people against idolatry, made a collection for an offering to be sent to Jerusalem, in expiation of the sin which his soldiers had committed.

38. the city of Odollam.] Adullam appears as a Canaanite city in Josh. xii. 15 (compare Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12). In the division of the Holy Land it was assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 35). The place appears to have been in the Shefêlah. It is probably identified with the "Aid-el-Ma" discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneau, near which is a cave, "sufficiently large to have been the habitation of David while his band were garrisoning the hold or fortress" ('Quarterly Statement' of Pal. Explor. Fund for Jan. 1881, p. 44). Aid-el-Ma is marked in the twenty-first sheet of the great map published by the Fund.

they purified themselves.] Contact with the heathen would have made most of them "unclean," more especially such as had killed an enemy (Num. xxxi. 19). The purification would be by means of ablution.

39. as the use had been.] Rather, "according as necessity required." The burial of the slain could not be longer deferred without danger to the living from the setting in of decomposition.

to bury them with their kinsmen in their fathers' graves.] This would scarcely have been possible in many cases, since the slain were, no doubt, from various and distant localities. They were probably all interred on the field of battle.

40. under the coats.] The χιτὼν is the close-fitting inner garment, corresponding to the modern "shirt," and in no way resembles our "coat." Evidently the soldiers sought to conceal the idol-offerings which they wore, as much as possible.

things consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites.] Votive offerings in silver or gold, such as abounded in every heathen temple, are probably intended. A superstitious feeling had induced the soldiers of Judas to carry these off from the temples of the Jamnites, and suspend them about their persons as amulets, which would avert dangers. The fact is very important, as indicating an undercurrent of heathenish feeling and belief, even among those Jews who, on the whole, clave to the Law, and ventured their lives in its defence. Judas would naturally be shocked by the discovery, and, to check such a departure from true religion, he made it public, and put it before his soldiers, that the amulets, instead of averting danger, had attracted it, and been "the cause" wherefore those who wore them had been slain.

which is forbidden the Jews by the law.] The Law was very strict in forbidding any adoption of even innocent heathen rites, or any conformity with heathen religious practices. (See Ex. xx. 4, 23, xxiii. 24, xxxiv. 13; Deut. xiv. 1, &c.) The particular practice here mentioned is not, however, forbidden in the Law expressly.

41. the Lord, the righteous Judge.] Compare above, v. 6.

who had opened, &c.] Rather, "who makes manifest the things which have been hid." The statement is quite general, though, no doubt, a special reference to the recent discovery is intended.

42. might wholly be put out of remembrance.] Literally, "might be completely

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 163. Judas exhorted the people to keep themselves from sin, forsomuch as they saw before their eyes the things that came to pass for the sins of those that were slain.

43 And when he had made a gathering throughout the company to the sum of two thousand drachms of silver, he sent it to Jerusalem to offer a sin offering, doing therein very well and honestly, in that he was mindful of the resurrection:

44 For if he had not hoped that they that were slain should have risen again, it had been superfluous and vain to pray for the dead.

B. C. cir. 163.

45 And also in that he perceived that there was great favour laid up for those that died godly, it was an holy and good thought. Whereupon he made a reconciliation for the dead, that they might be delivered from sin.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 Eupator invadeth Judea. 15 Judas by night slayeth many. 18 Eupator's purpose is defeated. 22 He maketh peace with Judas.

wiped out." Sin is "wiped out" by being forgiven, rather than by being forgotten. God can really never forget anything.

43. two thousand drachms of silver.] About eighty pounds of our money. Some MSS. give "three thousand;" the Vulgate, "twelve thousand." The money would be employed in the purchase of victims.

to offer a sin-offering.] On the law of sin-offerings, see Lev. iv. 2–35; v. 1–19; vi. 2–7. There is no indication in the Law that they were intended to be offered for the dead, nor any evidence to shew that they had ever been so offered before this occasion. Hence the anxiety of the writer to justify the act of Judas, which he does on general grounds.

doing therein very well and honestly.] Rather, "very well and rightly." Ἀστεῖος in the later Greek has the general sense of what is right and good.

he was mindful of the resurrection.] See the comment on ch. vi. 26; vii. 9.

44. to pray for the dead.] Offerings were supposed to be always accompanied by prayer. When a "sin-offering" was offered, it was, as a matter of course, accompanied by prayer that the sin for which the offering was made might be forgiven. (Compare v. 42.) The Jewish liturgies contain a form of "Prayer for the dead," called "the Kaddish," which is believed to be at least as old as the time of our Lord. (Farrar, 'Eternal Hope,' p. 216.)

45. And also, &c.] Verse 44 is parenthetic, being exegetical of the assertion in v. 43, that Judas "was mindful of the resurrection." Verse 45 is to be closely connected with the last clause of v. 43.

there was great favour laid up.] Compare ch. vii. 9, 11, 14, 23. The conviction of a happy future beyond the grave as reserved for the righteous was one of the chief animating principles of the Maccabæan revolt, and seems to have been confidently held by all classes. Judas regarded the sinners who had fallen as purged from their sin by the sin-offering and the prayers of the people, so that they passed into the class of those who "died"—or rather "slept"—in godliness, and became possessors of the "favour" laid up for that class.

it was an holy and good thought.] This clause is best detached from the preceding one, and taken as a sort of summary. The entire conception which Judas had formed on this matter was "holy and good."

he made a reconciliation.] Rather, "the reconciliation"—that which had been already mentioned (v. 43).

CHAPTER XIII.

§ 18. Great Expedition of Eupator and Lysias into Judæa.

1–26. This expedition is, beyond a doubt, identical with that which the author of the First Book describes in ch. vi. 23–63, and which he assigns to the 150th Seleucid year (ib. v. 20). It was provoked by attacks, which Judas was continually making, upon the Acra of Jerusalem, and the Syro-Macedonian garrison which held it (ib. 18–27). The army collected by Lysias was the largest ever brought against Judæa by the Syro-Macedonians. It was composed of foot, horse, chariots (2 Macc. xiii. 2), and elephants. The main campaign was on the Idumæan border, about the city of Beth-sura (1 Macc. vi. 31–50; 2 Macc. xiii. 19). The Syro-Macedonians had greatly the advantage over the Jews in the struggle; and the latter were only saved from complete subjugation by the sudden march of Philip on Antioch (1 Macc. vi. 35; 2 Macc. xiii. 23), which forced Lysias to bring the war to an end by a peace, under which the Jews were granted very favourable terms (1 Macc. vi. 59). The facts wherewith the author of the present Book enriches the history are his accounts of the

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 162.

IN the hundred forty and ninth year it was told Judas, that Antiochus Eupator was coming with a great power into Judea,

[a] ch. 11. 1.

2 And with him [a] Lysias his protector, and ruler of his affairs, having either of them a Grecian power of footmen, an hundred and ten thousand, and horsemen five thousand and three hundred, and elephants two and twenty, and three hundred chariots armed with hooks. B. C. cir. 162.

3 Menelaus also joined himself with them, and with great dissimulation encouraged Antiochus, not for the safeguard of the country, but because he thought to have been made governor.

4 But the King of kings moved Antiochus' mind against this wicked execution of Menelaus (vv. 3–8), of the prayer and fast of Judas (vv. 10–12), of his night attack on the Syrian camp near Modeïn (vv. 14–17), and of the disturbance at Ptolemaïs on the return of the Syrians from Judæa to Antioch (vv. 25, 26). The details of the great battle between Lysias and Judas are given only in the First Book (ch. vi. 33–47).

1. In the hundred forty and ninth year.] Really in the 150th year, which began in October, B.C. 163, and terminated in October, B.C. 162. It is conjectured that the author of the Second Book counts the Seleucid years from B.C. 313, instead of from B.C. 312.

that Antiochus Eupator was coming.] As in ch. xi., so here, the writer speaks of Eupator as if he had an actual part in the conduct of affairs, whereas he was a mere boy, entirely under the direction and control of Lysias. Lysias took him to the war in order that he might not lose sight of him.

2. Lysias his protector, and ruler of his affairs.] Compare ch. xi. 1, and 1 Macc. vi. 17.

having either of them a Grecian power of footmen.] It is not at all likely that the Syro-Macedonian forces were, in any sense, partitioned between Eupator and Lysias. Lysias was in command of the entire army.

an hundred and ten thousand.] The component elements of the army of Lysias at this time are stated somewhat differently in the First and Second Books of Maccabees:—

In the First Book.		In the Second Book.
Foot . .	100,000	Foot . .	110,000
Horse .	20,000	Horse .	5,300
Elephants	32	Elephants	22
		Chariots .	300

Josephus contradicts himself as to the numbers (comp. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 3, with 'Bell. Jud.' i. 1, § 5), and cannot be regarded as a trustworthy authority. The numbers of the Second Book are here, on the whole, the most probable.

three hundred chariots armed with hooks.] Rather, "with scythes" or "sickles." Scythed chariots were employed by the Persians at Cunaxa (Xen. 'Anab.' i. 8, § 10) and at Arbela (Q. Curt. 'Vit. Alex.' iv. 9; Diod. Sic. xvii. 53). In B.C. 220 they are said to have been brought by Molo against Antiochus the Great (Polyb. v. 53, § 10); and in B.C. 190 they were brought by Antiochus himself against the Romans (Liv. xxxvii. 41). There is thus nothing improbable in their employment by Eupator in B.C. 162. The number (300) seems, however, excessive; since Codomannus brought but 200 to Arbela (Arrian, 'Exp. Alex.' iii. 11).

3. Menelaus also joined himself with them.] Nothing is said of Menelaus having joined the expedition by the author of the First Book. It is conceivable, however, that he may have done so. Alcimus joined the expedition of Bacchides in the year following (1 Macc. vii. 9, 12). Menelaus's functions had ceased when the Temple was profaned (ch. vi. 2–4); and he had probably remained at Antioch during the interval between B.C. 168 and 162.

with great dissimulation.] Εἰρώνεια here is "simulation" rather than "dissimulation." Translate "with great pretence of patriotism."

not for the safeguard of the country.] I.e. "not really for the salvation of his country, as he pretended, but from a personal motive." Menelaus doubtless professed to see in the destruction of the Maccabean party and the full re-establishment of the Syrian yoke the only chance of prosperity for his unhappy country. So traitors argue at all times.

he thought to have been made governor.] Literally, "he thought to be established in his office." The "office" intended is that of High Priest, from which he had been, practically, deposed for five years.

4. But the King of kings.] This is probably the earliest application to God of a title frequently assumed by earthly sovereigns. It is found also in 3 Macc. v. 35, and in the Book of Enoch (ix. 4). The writers of the New Testament have adopted it, and given it the highest possible consecration. (See 1 Tim. vi. 5; Rev. xvii. 14, xix. 16.)

moved Antiochus' mind against this wicked

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 162. wretch, and Lysias informed the king that this man was the cause of all mischief, so that the king commanded to bring him unto Berea, and to put him to death, as the manner is in that place.

5 Now there was in that place a tower of fifty cubits high, full of ashes, and it had a round instrument, which on every side hanged down into the ashes.

6 And whosoever was condemned of sacrilege, or had committed any other grievous crime, there did all men thrust him unto death.

7 Such a death it happened that wicked man to die, not having so much as burial in the earth; and B. C. cir. 162. that most justly:

8 For inasmuch as he had committed many sins about the altar, whose fire and ashes were holy, he received his death in ashes.

9 Now the king came with a barbarous and haughty mind to do far worse to the Jews, than had been done in his father's time.

10 Which things when Judas perceived, he commanded the multitude to call upon the Lord night and day, that if ever at any other time, he would now also help them, being at the point to be put from their law, from their country, and from the holy temple:

wretch.] The execution of Menelaus, if it took place as here narrated, must have been the work of Lysias far more than of Eupator, whose consent to it would be a mere matter of form, like the signature, by modern constitutional sovereigns, of a death-warrant. How Menelaus had offended Lysias, or why the latter wished him to be put to death, is not apparent.

the cause of all mischief.] Rather, "the cause of all the mischief." It is quite conceivable that this might be asserted, especially as the real originator of the mischief, Jason (ch. iv. 7–26), was a fugitive in a distant land (ch. v. 8), and could not be made the scapegoat.

unto Berea.] The "Berœa" here intended is, no doubt, that which lay halfway between Hierapolis and Antioch (Plin. 'H. N.' v. 19; Strab. xvi. p. 751), on the site of the modern Aleppo. It was not a place of much importance in ancient times.

as the manner is in that place.] We have no other evidence of the existence of this cruel custom at Berœa; but suffocation in a pit full of ashes was a recognised Persian punishment, and one frequently inflicted on offenders of a high class. (See Ctesias, 'Persic. Excerpt.,' §§ 48, 52; Val. Max. ix. 2, § 7.)

5. a round instrument.] Rather, "an instrument that turned round;" a sort of wheel, whereon a man could be placed, which turned with him, and, after making half a revolution, dropped him off it into the ashes.

6. whosoever was condemned of sacrilege.] Menelaus had been guilty of sacrilege (ch. iv. 32), but it is scarcely likely that he was condemned for it, since his sacrilege consisted in his plundering the Jewish temple. He was probably executed as a traitor. Still there was an appropriateness in his being awarded a punishment specially assigned by custom to sacrilegious persons.

there did all men thrust him unto death.] A tumultuary proceeding seems to be intended, when a man, taken in the act, was hurried by a mob to the tower, and violently pushed against the machine described above, which caught him, and bore him to his death.

8. he had committed many sins about the altar.] Menelaus had accompanied Epiphanes into the Temple and given the sanction of his authority to the profanation of the sanctuary and the altar then begun, and carried afterwards to such lengths (ch. v. 15, 23; vi. 2–5, &c.). In the view of the Jews he was guilty of the entire series of pollutions to which his acts had led the way, and which he had at no time withstood. His death at this time, at the instance of Lysias, and the scene of it, Berœa, are confirmed by Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 7). The author of the First Book passes the matter over in silence.

9. the king came . . . to do far worse to the Jews, than had been done in his father's time.] Rather, "to do to the Jews the worst that had been done in his father's time." It would not have been possible to "do worse" than Epiphanes, who had profaned the Temple, put down the religion, set up idolatry, and commanded Lysias to slay or sell for slaves the entire nation (1 Macc. iii. 35–42). Eupator, or rather Lysias, came now with similar intentions (see v. 10).

10. being at the point to be put from their law, from their country, and from the holy temple.] This does not appear from the First Book. In collecting, however, the unusually large army brought against Judæa on this

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 162.

11 And that he would not suffer the people, that ‖had even now been but a little refreshed, to be in subjection to the blasphemous nations.

‖ Or, had had a little respite.

12 So when they had all done this together, and besought the merciful Lord with weeping and fasting, and lying flat upon the ground three days long, Judas, having exhorted them, commanded they should be in a readiness.

13 And Judas, being apart with the elders, determined, before the king's host should enter into Judea, and get the city, to go forth and try the matter in fight by the help of the Lord.

B. C. cir. 162.

14 So when he had committed all to the ‖Creator of the world, and exhorted his soldiers to fight manfully, even unto death, for the laws, the temple, the city, the country, and the commonwealth, he camped by Modin:

‖ Or, Lord.

15 And having given the watchword to them that were about him, Victory is of God; with the most valiant and choice young men he went in into the king's tent by night, and slew in the camp about four thousand men, and the chiefest of the occasion (see v. 2 and the comment), Lysias can scarcely have had any other design than to carry out fully the object with which he had entered on his first expedition, which was the complete extirpation of the entire people (1 Macc. iii. 35). So far as human foresight can judge, the design would have been triumphantly carried out and the Jewish nation swept from the earth, had not Philip, at the most critical moment, marched on Antioch and forced Lysias to turn all his attention towards him. (See especially 1 Macc. vi. 47–54, where the extremity to which Judas was reduced is made far more apparent than it is by the present writer.)

11. but a little refreshed.] Rather, "but for a short time refreshed." It was three years only since the recovery of the Temple.

12. lying flat upon the ground.] The ordinary prostration in prayer is intended. (Compare 1 Macc. iv. 40; 2 Macc. x. 4.)

commanded they should be in a readiness.] Rather, "commanded that they should come to him."

13. with the elders.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 33. This is the first indication of Judas having so far organised a civil government as to have established a council of "elders." No doubt, however, from the time of the recovery of the Temple hill, the national character of the outbreak was recognised, and, while Judas commanded in the field, something like a civil power held possession of eastern Jerusalem. With this civil power he from time to time took counsel.

before the king's host should . . . get the city.] I.e. recapture the part of Jerusalem which Judas had recovered (ch. x. 1).

to go forth and try the matter.] I.e. to march against the enemy—not to wait within walls for the royal assault, but to take the field, and seek an opportunity for attack, as he had always done previously (1 Macc. iii. 11, 23; iv. 12; v. 33, 43; 2 Macc. viii. 6, 23, &c.).

14. the Creator of the world.] Compare ch. i. 24; vii. 23. The "Creator of the world" could not but be all-powerful, and able to give the victory to whomsoever He pleased.

for the laws, the temple, the city, the country, and the commonwealth.] For all that they valued, either in Church or State—for the Divine laws, the Temple, Jerusalem, Judæa, their new freedom and self-government.

he camped by Modin.] The Syrian line of march was along the coast from Carmel, through the low plains of Sharon and Philistia. (See the comment on 1 Macc. vi. 31.) They were wont to attack Judæa either from the west or from the south. Judas therefore marched westward to the commanding position of Modin or Modeïn, whence he could observe the movements of Lysias, and watch his opportunity for striking a blow.

15. the watchword . . . Victory is of God.] Compare the watchword given in the battle with Nicanor (ch. viii. 23)—"Help is from God." It was especially necessary to give a watchword before a night attack.

he . . . slew in the camp about four thousand men.] It is strange that the author of the First Book says nothing of this daring exploit. Perhaps he omitted it, since it did not affect the result of the war. Lysias continued his march, only with greater caution than previously, and took up the position in Idumæa which he had probably from the first intended. It was the same position which he had occupied in his previous attack upon Judas (1 Macc. iv. 29).

the chiefest of the elephants.] It is not at

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 162. elephants, with all that were upon him.

16 And at last they filled the camp with fear and tumult, and departed with good success.

17 This was done in the break of the day, because the protection of the Lord did help him.

18 Now when the king had taken a taste of the manliness of the Jews, he went about to take the holds by policy.

19 And marched toward Bethsura, which was a strong hold of the Jews: but he was put to flight, failed, and lost of his men: B. C. cir. 162.

20 For Judas had conveyed unto them that were in it such things as were necessary.

21 But Rhodocus, who was in the Jews' host, disclosed the secrets to the enemies; therefore he was sought out, and when they had gotten him, they put him in prison.

22 The king treated with them in Bethsura the second time, gave his hand, took their's, departed, fought with Judas, was overcome;

all clear how this could be known, in the confusion and darkness of a night attack. One is led to suspect some confusion between this exploit of Judas and the later one of his brother Eleazar, who in broad daylight singled out the biggest of the elephants in the army of Eupator, attacked him and slew him, sacrificing his own life in the encounter (1 Macc. vi. 43–46).

with all that were upon him.] Literally, "with the crowd that was in his house." The "house" is the wooden tower on the elephant's back. This was believed by the Jews of Maccabæan times to have been occupied by above thirty men! (See 1 Macc. vi. 37.)

17. This was done in the break of the day.] Or, "This took place when the day was already breaking." Though the protection of the darkness was withdrawn, God's protection saved Judas from disaster.

18. Now when the king had taken a taste, &c.] A change of policy is indicated. The Syrians had started forth on their expedition confident in their overwhelming strength. Judas's slaughter of 4000 men in their camp not far from Modeïn, had dispelled this confidence and made them see the necessity of proceeding with caution. The rest of the campaign was carried on according to the most approved rules of military art (διὰ μεθόδων).

19. And marched toward Bethsura.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 31.

which was a strong hold of the Jews.] Judas had seized it and fortified it, after the failure of Lysias's first expedition (1 Macc. iv. 61). Previously it seems to have been held by the Idumæans (ib. v. 29).

he was put to flight, failed, and lost of his men.] This does not appear in the narrative of the First Book, where we have a description of a great battle between the hosts of Judas and Lysias in the vicinity of Bethsura, in which, though Lysias suffered certain losses, he was in the end completely victorious, forcing the army under Judas to retreat and leave Bethsura to its fate (1 Macc. vi. 42–47). It may be true, however, that Lysias made one assault upon the place which failed.

20. For Judas had conveyed unto them.] Rather, "And Judas [hereupon] conveyed unto them." It is meant that Judas took advantage of Lysias's failure to throw provisions into the town.

21. Rhodocus.] Nothing more is known of this traitor; for it is a wild fancy of Hitzig's that he was the author of the 86th and 88th Psalms.

disclosed the secrets.] Rather, "their secrets"—as their numbers, plans, weak points, and the like. Having to acknowledge, grudgingly, certain successes on the part of Lysias (v. 22), the author seeks to minimise the credit attaching to him for them by suggesting that they were attributable to treachery in the Jewish camp.

22. The king treated with them in Bethsura, &c.] In point of fact, Bethsura seems to have surrendered at discretion. The provisions were exhausted, and it was impossible to make any further resistance. (See 1 Macc. vi. 49, 50.)

fought with Judas, was overcome.] It is impossible to characterise this statement otherwise than as an absolute falsehood. Both the author of the First Book (1 Macc. vi. 47) and Josephus ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 5) admit the complete defeat of Judas, who retired with the remnant of his army to Jerusalem, whereupon Lysias, dividing his forces, pressed the siege of Bethsura to a successful issue, while at the same time he advanced upon Jerusalem and besieged Judas within its walls. Jerusalem itself must have surrendered, being well-nigh starved out, had not the news of Philip's march upon Antioch made it imperative upon Lysias to forego his

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 162.

23 Heard that Philip, who was left over the affairs in Antioch, ‖was desperately bent, confounded, intreated the Jews, submitted himself, and sware to all equal conditions, agreed with them, and offered sacrifice, honoured the temple, and dealt kindly with the place,

‖ Or, rebelled.

24 And accepted well of Maccabeus, made him principal governor from Ptolemais unto the Gerrhenians;

25 Came to Ptolemais: the people there were grieved for the covenants; for they stormed, because they would make their covenants void:

B. C. cir. 162.

26 Lysias went up to the judgment seat, said as much as could be in defence of the cause, persuaded, pacified, made them well affected, returned to Antioch. Thus it went touching the king's coming and departing.

prize, and return in all haste to the Syrian capital. (See 1 Macc. vi. 48–60.)

23. Heard that Philip, who was left over the affairs in Antioch, was desperately bent.] Rather, "heard that Philip, who had been left over the affairs, was entered on desperate courses at Antioch." Philip, "left over the affairs" of the empire by Epiphanes in his last moments (1 Macc. vi. 14, 15), returned to Antioch during Lysias's absence in Palestine, and there took the desperate, or at any rate the dangerous, course of setting himself up as actual ruler of the kingdom (ib. vv. 56, 63). Lysias, finding his position challenged, had to meet his rival without delay.

confounded.] Rather, "was confounded." "The king" is the grammatical, Lysias the rightful subject. At the receipt of the intelligence concerning Philip, Lysias was for a time "confounded," and scarcely knew what he should do. He soon, however, recovered himself, and took the needful steps.

intreated the Jews, submitted himself.] These terms are somewhat too strong; but they perhaps fairly represent the construction which the Jews put on Lysias's sudden change of front, and spontaneous offer of terms of peace to them (1 Macc. vi. 60).

sware to all equal conditions.] Compare 1 Macc. vi. 59, 61. The chief proviso was, that the Jews should be allowed to "live after their own laws, as they did before."

offered sacrifice.] This statement is additional to those made in the First Book; but it is quite in harmony with them. Of course the act of sacrifice was performed by the Jewish priests.

dealt kindly with the place.] The writer of the First Book notes one exception. When the strength of the fortifications was seen, the Syro-Macedonian leaders, though they had sworn to leave all intact, broke their oaths, and demolished great part of the defences (1 Macc. vi. 62, 63). We must understand the present writer as meaning that they did no wanton injury to the sacred buildings.

24. made him principal governor.] Rather, "made Hegemonidas governor." (So the Syriac Version, and, among commentators, Wernsdorf, Hasse, Scholtz, and Grimm.) It is very unlikely that Judas would have been made governor, and still more unlikely that, if he had been made governor, the author of the First Book would not have mentioned it. The word ἡγεμονίδης, moreover, is not found elsewhere as an adjective.

unto the Gerrhenians.] The "Gerrhenians" should be the inhabitants of Gerrha, which lay between Pelusium and Rhinocolura. But as even Rhinocolura belonged at this time to Egypt (Polyb. v. 80, § 3), it is impossible that Gerrha can be intended. Perhaps Γερρήνοι is a corruption of Γεραρηνοί (found in one MS.), and Gerar, not Gerrha, is pointed out as the southern limit of the Syro-Macedonian dominion.

25. Came to Ptolemais.] On the site and history of Ptolemaïs, see the comment upon 1 Macc. v. 15.

the people there were grieved for the covenants.] Ptolemaïs, as one of the most rising cities of these parts, was especially jealous of Jerusalem. It had taken a prominent part in the general rising which had followed the recovery of the Temple by Judas (1 Macc. v. 15), and had suffered shortly afterwards at the hands of Simon (ib. v. 22). Hence there was great indignation at Ptolemaïs when the favourable terms of peace granted to the Jews were made known to the inhabitants.

their covenants.] Rather, "the covenants"—i.e. the terms of peace between Judas and Eupator.

26. Lysias went up to the judgment seat.] Rather, "to the tribune"—the rostra—the place from which speeches were made to the people.

persuaded, pacified, made them well affected, returned to Antioch.] The extreme brevity of the style in vv. 19–26 is very remarkable, and recalls the author's observations, in ch. ii. 29–32, on the duty of an epitomator.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

CHAPTER XIV.

6 Alcimus accuseth Judas. 18 Nicanor maketh peace with Judas. 39 He seeketh to take Razis, 46 who, to escape his hands, killeth himself.

AFTER three years was Judas informed, that Demetrius the [a] son of Seleucus, [a] having entered by the haven of Tripolis with a great power and navy,

[a] 1 Mac. 7. 1.

2 Had taken the country, and killed Antiochus, and Lysias his protector.

B. C. cir. 161.

3 Now [b] one Alcimus, who had been high priest, and had defiled himself wilfully in the times of their mingling with the Gentiles, seeing that by no means he could save himself, nor have any more access to the holy altar,

[b] 1 Mac. 7. 5.

CHAPTER XIV.

PART V.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SYRIANS AND THE JEWS IN THE REIGN OF DEMETRIUS SOTER.

§ 1. DEMETRIUS HAVING MADE HIMSELF KING, ALCIMUS COMPLAINS TO HIM OF JUDAS. NICANOR COMMISSIONED BY DEMETRIUS TO KILL JUDAS AND ESTABLISH ALCIMUS AS HIGH PRIEST.

1–14. Omitting the contest between Lysias and Philip (briefly touched in 1 Macc. vi. 63), our author passes to the time when Demetrius, the son of Seleucus IV., having escaped from Rome, landed on the Syrian coast and commenced his struggle for the crown. At first he met with great success, defeating Lysias, and killing both him and Eupator. Being established as king at Antioch, he received an application from a certain Alcimus, who claimed that the high priesthood belonged to him of right, and besought Demetrius to establish him in the office, at the same time deposing Judas from his high position. Demetrius adopted the advice, and sent Nicanor against Judas, with orders to kill him and establish Alcimus as High Priest. The passage runs parallel with 1 Macc. vii. 1–26, but contains some remarkable differences from that narrative. According to the present writer, Demetrius responded to the appeal of Alcimus by the immediate appointment of Nicanor to the chief command against Judas, and that commander began by attempts to negotiate a peace. According to the author of the First Book and Josephus, the person sent to instal Alcimus was Bacchides (1 Macc. vii. 8; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xii. 10, § 2); and it was at a considerably later date that, on a special application from Alcimus, who found his position in Judæa untenable, Nicanor was sent. Nicanor's relations with Judas are also very differently represented by the two writers. According to the First Book, he was "a man that bare deadly hate unto Israel" (ch. vii. 26); according to the Second, he was altogether friendly, and was forced by Demetrius against his will to adopt hostile measures. On the whole, the representations of the author of the First Book appear to be most worthy of credit.

1. After three years.] Demetrius effected his landing, as our author intimates below (v. 4), in the 151st Seleucid year, or B.C. 162–1. The expedition of Eupator and Lysias was, according to him, in the 149th year (ch. xiii. 1)—B.C. 164–3, or only two years earlier. Thus our author must mean by his "three years" one entire year and fractions of two others.

Demetrius the son of Seleucus.] See the comment on 1 Macc. vii. 1.

having entered by the haven of Tripolis.] "Tripolis," now represented by Tarablous, was a port on the Syrian coast, about 70 miles north of Sidon, and 115 south of Seleucia. It was an old Phœnician settlement, said to have been a joint colony from Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus (Strab. xvi. 2); but had by this time been thoroughly Hellenized. The landing of Demetrius at Tripolis is confirmed by Porphyry ('Excerpt.' p. 71) and Eusebius ('Chron. Can.' i. xl. § 15).

with a great power and navy.] The author of the First Book says, on the contrary, that he landed "with a few men" (1 Macc. vii. 1), which is far more in accordance with the narrative of Polybius and with probability. His success was consequent on the revolt of the Syrian army, which seized its leaders, Lysias and Eupator, and went over in a body to Demetrius (ib. v. 2).

2. Had . . . killed Antiochus and Lysias.] The rebel army actually killed them, on Demetrius hinting a wish that they should so do (ib. vv. 3, 4).

3. one Alcimus, who had been high priest, and had defiled himself wilfully, &c.] The writer seems to mean that Alcimus had held the high priesthood some time previously—perhaps before Jason—and now claimed to be reinstated in it; not that he had received the office from Lysias, as Josephus imagines ('Ant. Jud.' xii. 9, § 7).

in the times of their mingling.] The time when Hellenism was rampant and a fusion of the Jews with the Syro-Macedonians was almost brought about. (See 1 Macc. i. 41–57; 2 Macc. iv. 7–19, vi. 1–9.)

by no means he could save himself.] Lite-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

4 Came to king Demetrius in the hundred and one and fiftieth year, presenting unto him a crown of gold, and a palm, and also of the boughs which were ‖used solemnly in the temple: and so that day he held his peace.

‖ Or, thought to be of the temple.

5 Howbeit, having gotten opportunity to further his foolish enterprize, and being called into counsel by Demetrius, and asked how the Jews stood affected, and what they intended, he answered thereunto:

6 Those of the Jews that be called Assideans, whose captain is Judas Maccabeus, nourish war, and are seditious, and will not let the realm be in peace.

B. C. cir. 161.

7 Therefore I, being deprived of mine ancestors' honour, I mean the high priesthood, am now come hither:

8 First, verily for the unfeigned care I have of things pertaining to the king; and secondly, even for that I intend the good of mine own countrymen: for all our nation is in no small misery through the unadvised dealing of them aforesaid.

9 Wherefore, O king, seeing thou knowest all these things, be careful rally, "there was no safety for him." If he had, like Jason, used his office to further the destruction of Judaism, he would no doubt have provoked a hostile feeling on the part of the more religious Jews, which he may have felt as continually threatening his life.

nor have any more access to the holy altar.] Of course, while the Maccabæan party had possession of the Temple, it was impossible that a renegade from the faith should be allowed to officiate at the altar.

4. Came to king Demetrius in the hundred and one and fiftieth year.] See the comment on v. 1.

presenting unto him a crown of gold.] Such presents were common at the time (Polyb. xxii. 13, § 10; 17, § 4; xxiv. 1, § 7;—Liv. xxxviii. 14, &c.), and without them no applicant could expect to obtain favour at the Syrian court.

and a palm.] A golden vine (Herod. vii. 27) and a golden plane-tree (Athen. 'Deipn.' xii. p. 414, F) were among the most precious ornaments of the great palace of the Persian kings. A golden palm is probably here intended, a work of art possessing the double value of precious material and artistic workmanship.

and also of the boughs which were used, &c.] Palm boughs are probably meant, such as were used at the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh. viii. 15) and at the Feast of the Dedication (supra, ch. x. 7). This presentation to Demetrius might be regarded as a mode of congratulating him on his successes, since to the Greeks the palm was the sign of victory.

that day he held his peace.] Alcimus did not at once prefer his request, lest it should be too palpable that the present was a bribe. Menelaus had not been so scrupulous (ch. iv. 24).

5. and being called into counsel.] Rather, "since he was called into counsel." This was the opportunity.

6. Those of the Jews that be called Assideans.] On the meaning of the word "Assidean," see the comment on 1 Macc. iii. 43. Originally it was the name of a strict sect, but Alcimus now applies it to the whole of the patriotic party under Judas.

nourish war and are seditious.] I.e. are determined to resist to the uttermost the overthrow of their religion.

will not let the realm be in peace.] The realm could "be in peace" at any time, by the concession to the Jews of the right to retain the use of their own laws and religion. This both the Syrians and Alcimus knew very well. (See 1 Macc. vi. 59.)

7. being deprived of my ancestors' honour.] It is allowed on all hands that Alcimus was "of the seed of Aaron" (1 Macc. vii. 14), and so had had one of his ancestors a High Priest; but it is not clear that any other of his ancestors had ever enjoyed the honour. The statement that he had been "deprived" rests on the view put forward in v. 3, which is not borne out either by Josephus or by the author of the First Book.

8. First, verily, &c.] Alcimus puts forward two motives as actuating him: (1) regard for the king's interests; and (2) regard for the well-being of his countrymen. He keeps his own aggrandisement, which was his true motive, wholly in the background.

the unadvised dealing of them aforesaid.] I.e. of the Assideans—the party that supported Judas (see v. 6).

9. seeing thou knowest.] Rather, "when thou hast acquired a knowledge of." The suggestion is that the king should first inquire into the truth of Alcimus's assertions, and then, if he found them true, act upon them—a reasonable course to recommend.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161. for the country, and our nation, which is pressed on every side, according to the clemency that thou readily shewest unto all.

10 For as long as Judas liveth, it is not possible that the state should be quiet.

11 This was no sooner spoken of him, but others of the king's friends, being maliciously set against Judas, did more incense Demetrius.

12 And forthwith calling Nicanor, who had been master of the elephants, and making him governor over Judea, B. C. cir. 161. [c] he sent him forth, 13 Commanding him to slay Judas, and to scatter them that were [c] 1 Mac. 7. 26. with him, and to make Alcimus high priest of the great temple.

14 Then the heathen, that had fled out of Judea from Judas, came to Nicanor by flocks, thinking the harm and calamities of the Jews to be their welfare.

15 Now when the Jews heard of Nicanor's coming, and that the hea-our nation, which is pressed on every side.] It must be admitted that there was ground for this representation. The policy of Judas, whenever he was left to himself by the Syrians, was to harass and oppress, and so far as possible root out, the opposite party. No sooner was the peace made with Lysias than he proceeded to "make havock" among his adversaries (1 Macc. vii. 7), to put to death some and banish others (ibid. v. 6; compare ch. iii. 8, vi. 24, vii. 24, &c.), so that the opposite side had reason to complain.

11. others of the king's friends.] Rather, "the remainder of the king's friends." Alcimus, having been "called into counsel" (v. 5), is reckoned among the number of such persons. On the details of the complaints made, see 1 Macc. vii. 5–7.

12. And forthwith calling Nicanor.] It has been already noticed that, according to Josephus and the writer of the First Book, Demetrius called in the first instance, not on Nicanor, but on Bacchides. Bacchides, at the head of an army, accompanied Alcimus to Jerusalem, and installed him in the western city under the protection of the garrison of the Acra, after which, having met with no resistance in the field, he returned to Antioch (1 Macc. vii. 8–20). All this the present writer omits, being, apparently, unaware of it.

who had been master of the elephants.] Rather, "who had been made master of the elephants;" i.e. who had received this appointment on the accession of Demetrius to power. It has been argued that Nicanor could not have been appointed to the office at this time, since the elephants had been destroyed by the Romans before Demetrius landed in Syria (Appian, 'Syriac.' § 46); but we may question whether Rome was ever able to obtain the complete execution of her orders with regard to the Syrian elephants. Lysias had a number in Judæa in B.C. 162 (1 Macc. vi. 20, 30), and Nicanor seems to have had some in the same country in B.C. 161 (2 Macc. xv. 21). The younger Demetrius had an elephant corps in B.C. 145 (1 Macc. xi. 56).

making him governor over Judea.] Rather, "commandant in Judæa." A military, not a civil, office is intended.

13. high priest of the great temple.] Alcimus had been granted the high-priestly office by Demetrius, and proclaimed by Bacchides; but he had not been given possession of the Temple. It is possible that Nicanor was commanded to complete his installation by taking the Temple from the partisans of Judas, and handing it over to Alcimus as its proper master.

§ 2. EXPEDITION OF NICANOR. HIS FRIENDLY RELATIONS WITH JUDAS. ORDERED BY DEMETRIUS TO ARREST JUDAS, HE BREAKS WITH HIM AND THREATENS TO DESTROY THE TEMPLE.

15–36. According to the writer of the First Book, Nicanor, on reaching Jerusalem, made some attempts at negotiations with Judas, but without any honest intent, his design being to get possession of his person (1 Macc. vii. 27–30). Judas avoided his snares, and soon broke off communications with him. Our present author puts before us an entirely different view. According to him, Nicanor "loved Judas from his heart" (v. 24), and acted in the most friendly manner towards him, until Alcimus complained to Demetrius of his conduct; and Demetrius, having expressed disapproval of the negotiations, required his officer to break off friendly relations with the arch-rebel, to seize him, and send him a prisoner to Antioch. It was in consequence of these peremptory orders that Nicanor took a hostile tone towards Judas, required the patriots who held the Temple to give him up, and, when they professed inability, threatened the Temple itself with destruction.

15. they cast earth upon their heads.] Compare ch. x. 25.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

‖ Or, were joined to them.

then ‖were up against them, they cast earth upon their heads, and made supplication to him that had established his people for ever, and who always helpeth his portion with manifestation of his presence.

16 So at the commandment of the captain they removed straightways from thence, and came near unto them at the town of Dessau.

17 Now Simon, Judas' brother, had joined battle with Nicanor, but was somewhat discomfited through the sudden silence of his enemies.

18 Nevertheless Nicanor, hearing of the manliness of them that were with Judas, and the courageousness that they had to fight for their country, durst not try the matter by the sword. B. C. cir. 161.

19 Wherefore he sent Posidonius, and Theodotus, and Mattathias, to make peace.

20 So when they had taken long advisement thereupon, and the captain had made the multitude acquainted therewith, and it appeared that they were all of one mind, they consented to the covenants,

21 And appointed a day to meet in together by themselves: and when the day came, and stools were set for either of them,

22 Judas placed armed men ready in convenient places, lest some treachery should be suddenly practised him that had established his people for ever.] See Deut. xxviii. 9; xxix. 13. The promise was, however, conditional, and was forfeited when the conditions were broken.

who always helpeth his portion.] Israel is called God's "portion" (khêleq) first in Deut. xxxii. 9. A similar phrase is used by Jeremiah (xii. 10) and Zechariah (ii. 12). The word implies a peculiar right of exclusive ownership.

with manifestation of his presence.] The writer has probably in his mind, especially, the sensible manifestations in which he believes so firmly. (See ch. iii. 25, 26, 33, 34; x. 29, 30; xi. 8; xii. 22.) But he no doubt intended to include spiritual manifestations also.

16. the captain.] I.e. Judas.

they removed . . . from thence.] From the place where they were assembled, probably Jerusalem, i.e. the eastern city.

came near unto them at the town of Dessau.] The "town" or rather "village" of Dessau is otherwise unknown, unless we identify it (as Ewald suggests) with the "Adasa" of 1 Macc. vii. 40.

17. Simon . . . had joined battle with Nicanor.] We have no other mention of this encounter. It probably took place while Nicanor was on the march. (See Ewald, 'Hist. of Israel,' vol. v. p. 321, note 2.)

through the sudden silence of his enemies.] Ἀφασία is not simple "silence," but "speechlessness" caused by consternation. Such "speechlessness" on the part of an enemy could not produce a defeat. Probably we should translate, with Grimm, "through the sudden consternation into which they were thrown by their enemies." The ἀφασία was on the part of Simon's men—not of Nicanor's.

18. the courageousness that they had to fight for their country.] Rather, "their courage in the battles that they had fought for their country."

durst not try.] Rather, "shrank from trying."

19. he sent Posidonius . . . to make peace.] The writer of the First Book admits the fact of the negotiations (1 Macc. vii. 27–29), but represents them as broken off almost immediately, on the discovery that they were not sincere, but a device for seizing the person of Judas. Our present author allows that Judas had suspicions, but represents Nicanor as honest, and declares that peace was actually made. It is difficult to suppose that the circumstances related in vv. 20–29 are wholly fictitious.

20. when . . . the captain had made the multitude acquainted therewith.] By "the multitude" must be meant the mass of the troops. (Compare v. 41.)

21. appointed a day to meet in together by themselves.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 29.

when the day came.] It is doubtful whether the words used can have this sense. Grimm translates, "And Judas came to the discussion."

stools.] I.e. "seats of honour."

22. Judas placed armed men ready.] As a measure of precaution. On any appearance of treachery, they would have started from their hiding-places, and rushed forward to give him protection. According to our author, the suspicions of Judas were unfounded, and the precautions taken unnecessary.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 161.

by the enemies: so they made a peaceable conference.

23 Now Nicanor abode in Jerusalem, and did no hurt, but sent away the people that came flocking unto him.

24 And he would not willingly have Judas out of his sight: for he loved the man from his heart.

25 He prayed him also to take a wife, and to beget children: so he married, was quiet, and took part of this life.

Or, lived together with him.

26 But Alcimus, perceiving the love that was betwixt them, and considering the covenants that were made, came to Demetrius, and told him that Nicanor was not well affected toward the state; for that he had ordained Judas, a traitor to his realm, to be the king's successor.

27 Then the king being in a rage, and provoked with the accusations of the most wicked man, wrote to Nicanor, signifying that he was much displeased with the covenants, and commanding him that he should send Maccabeus prisoner in all haste unto Antioch.

B. C. cir. 161.

28 When this came to Nicanor's hearing, he was much confounded in himself, and took it grievously that he should make void the articles which were agreed upon, the man being in no fault.

29 But because there was no dealing against the king, he watched his time to accomplish this thing by policy.

30 Notwithstanding, when Maccabeus saw that Nicanor began to be churlish unto him, and that he entreated him more roughly than he was wont, perceiving that such sour behaviour came not of good, he gathered together not a few of his men, and withdrew himself from Nicanor.

cir. 161.

31 But the other, knowing that he

23. Nicanor . . . sent away the people that came flocking unto him.] Rather, "that had come flocking to him." The reference is to the "heathen" that had come to him "by flocks," when he set out on his expedition against Judas (v. 14). These he now dismissed to their homes, either as a blind, or honestly thinking that he would have no need of their services.

24. he would not willingly have Judas out of his sight.] Literally, "he kept Judas in sight continually." Contrast the statement made by the writer of the First Book: "After it was known to Judas, that he (Nicanor) came unto him with deceit, he was sore afraid of him, and would see his face no more" (1 Macc. vii. 30).

25. He prayed him also to take a wife.] He represented to him that the time of war and struggle was over, and that it would be well for him now to contract the ties which every Jew was expected to contract—to marry and have children. According to our author, Judas followed his advice, "married, and was quiet, and took part of this life,"—i.e. became a peaceable citizen.

26. Alcimus . . . considering the covenants that were made.] Rather, "taking with him the treaty that had been made." Alcimus contrived to get a copy of the treaty, and took it with him to shew to the king.

he had ordained Judas . . . to be the king's successor.] Such a design as this could never have entered into the head of Nicanor or of any one else, and Alcimus would have been very silly to have accused him of it. The design really imputed is an intention to instal Judas as "his own successor" in the government of Palestine. Alcimus desired this post for himself.

28. he was much confounded in himself.] Rather, "perplexed." "Confounded" is too literal a translation.

the man.] I.e. Judas.

29. he watched his time to accomplish this thing by policy.] Here the writer of the Second Book becomes of accord with the author of the First. He admits that Nicanor, while still pretending friendship towards Judas, sought to arrest him (1 Macc. vii. 29, 30). Judas perceived the change in Nicanor's sentiments, though no doubt he intended to conceal them.

30. withdrew himself from Nicanor.] Literally, "concealed himself." The author of the First Book says that he quitted Jerusalem and went to Caphar-salama, whither Nicanor followed him at the head of his army. A battle was fought between the two, and Nicanor was defeated with the loss of 5000 men (1 Macc. vii. 31, 32). Nicanor and his beaten troops returned to Jerusalem.

31. knowing that he was notably prevented by Judas' policy.] Literally, "perceiving that

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

was notably prevented by Judas' policy, [d] came into the great and holy temple, and commanded the priests, that were offering their usual sacrifices, to deliver him the man.

[d] 1 Mac. 7. 33, &c.

32 And when they sware that they could not tell where the man was whom he sought, 33 He stretched out his right hand toward the temple, and made an oath in this manner: If ye will not deliver me Judas as ‖a prisoner, I will lay this temple of God even with the ground, and I will break down the altar, and erect a notable temple unto Bacchus.

‖ Gr. bound.

B. C. cir. 161.

34 After these words he departed. Then the priests lifted up their hands toward heaven, and besought him that was ever a defender of their nation, saying in this manner;

35 Thou, O Lord of all things, who hast need of nothing, wast pleased that the temple of thine habitation should be among us:

36 Therefore now, O holy Lord of all holiness, keep this house ever undefiled, which lately was cleansed, and stop every unrighteous mouth.

he was notably out-generalled by Judas"—i.e. "outwitted, overreached."

came into the great and holy temple.] The author of the First Book tells us that he "went up to Mount Sion," and that there "certain of the priests and elders came out of the sanctuary to him," and proposed to shew him the burnt sacrifice that was offered continually for the Syrian king, but says nothing of Nicanor being received within the Temple walls. Still it is possible that he may have been admitted into the outer court. But the party of Judas remained masters of the Temple, which Nicanor could only impotently threaten. (See v. 33.)

commanded the priests . . . to deliver him the man.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 35. Nicanor seems to have supposed that Judas was somewhere within the Temple fortress.

33. He stretched out his right hand toward the temple.] Rather, "toward the sanctuary" (εἰς τὸν νεών). The ναὸς of this passage is to be carefully distinguished from the ἱερὸν of v. 31. Nicanor was in the one; he stretched out his hand towards the other.

break down.] Rather, "raze—utterly destroy."

and erect a notable temple unto Bacchus.] The Syro-Macedonian worship of Dionysus, or Bacchus, has already appeared in ch. vi. 7. It was evidently felt that there was something specially repugnant to Jewish ideas in the cult, which was therefore both threatened and, when opportunity served, actually enforced upon the nation. Dionysiac orgies were of the most disgusting character. (See Döllinger, 'Jew and Gentile,' vol. i. pp. 154–156.)

34. Then the priests lifted up their hands toward heaven.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 36, where we are told that the priests "entered in, and stood before the altar and the temple, weeping." The threat of Nicanor was felt as a terrible blasphemy.

a defender of their nation.] Literally, "of our nation"—a transition from the third to the first person which gives the narrative greater liveliness.

35. O Lord of all things.] Rather, "O Lord." The phrase τῶν ὅλων is not to be attached to Κύριε, but to ἀπροσδεής.

who hast need of nothing.] Compare 3 Macc. ii. 9, and Josephus, 'Ant. Jud.' viii. 3, § 3, where a similar clause is introduced into Solomon's consecration prayer. The αὐτάρκεια of God has been a favourite theme with theologians (Clem. Alex. 'Homil.' ii. 44; Pearson, 'Exposition of the Creed,' Art. 1, pp. 94, 95, &c.).

the temple of thine habitation.] Even in the absence of the Shechinah, which, according to Jewish tradition, never shewed itself in the second Temple, the building was still regarded as the "habitation" of God—His house, in which He dwelt. (See Ezra vii. 15, 19; Ps. cxxxv. 21; Zech. ii. 12, 13, vii. 2, &c.) Hence the extreme wickedness of profaning it, or even threatening it.

36. O holy Lord of all holiness.] I.e. "holy Lord, the source and fount of all other holiness in things or beings."

and stop every unrighteous mouth.] This clause is omitted in some MSS. It is, of course, an allusion to the "unrighteous mouth" of Nicanor (v. 33). The author of the First Book makes the prayer of the priests mainly an imprecation of evil on Nicanor's head (1 Macc. vii. 38).

§ 3. NICANOR ORDERS THE ARREST OF RAZIS, WHO, RATHER THAN BE MADE PRISONER, COMMITS SUICIDE.

37–46. The story of Razis rests solely on the authority of the present writer, being

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 161.

37 Now was there accused unto Nicanor one Razis, one of the elders of Jerusalem, a lover of his countrymen, and a man of very good report, who for his kindness was called a father of the Jews.

38 For in the former times, when they mingled not themselves with the Gentiles, he had been accused of Judaism, and did boldly jeopard his body and life with all vehemency for the religion of the Jews.

39 So Nicanor, willing to declare the hate that he bare unto the Jews, sent above five hundred men of war to take him:

40 For he thought by taking him to do the Jews much hurt.

41 Now when the multitude would have taken the tower, and violently broken into the outer door, and bade that fire should be brought to burn it, he being ready to be taken on every side fell upon his sword;

wholly untouched by either Josephus or the author of the First Book. Though probably exaggerated in its details, it is likely to be true in respect of its main substance, since so full and circumstantial an account of the death of a Jew of rank under such extraordinary and painful circumstances is not likely to have been invented. The name Razis may be compared with the Reesaias of 1 Esdr. v. 8. The temper displayed is not unsuitable to a Jew of the period—an age when heathen sentiments and rules of conduct penetrated deeply among the mass of the more religious Jews and largely influenced their conduct. (Compare the comment on 1 Macc. ii. 51.)

37. one of the elders of Jerusalem.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 33, where certain of the elders of Jerusalem are said to have gone out to meet Nicanor.

who . . . was called a father of the Jews.] See Job xxix. 16, "I was a father to the poor;" and compare Ecclus. iv. 10; 1 Macc. ii. 65. In the East a protector is commonly called a "father."

38. in the former times, when they mingled not themselves with the Gentiles.] Not the times before the Hellenizing movement, especially promoted by Jason (ch. iv. 7–22), set in, but the early days of the persecution, when the religious Jews fled from the cities of Judah into "secret places" (1 Macc. i. 53; ii. 31), in order to continue the exercise of their religion, and thus separated themselves wholly from the Gentiles.

he had been accused of Judaism.] Judaism, the mere confessing oneself to be a Jew, had been made a crime by Epiphanes (ch. vi. 6), just as Christianity was by the early Roman emperors. Death was the punishment of persistence, as appears by the narratives in chs. vi. 18–31, vii. 1–42.

did boldly jeopard his body and life.] It does not appear how Razis escaped; but we may be sure that it was by no unworthy compliances.

39. Nicanor, willing to declare the hate that he bare unto the Jews.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 26. Nicanor probably felt it necessary to rebut the accusations of Alcimus (v. 26) by some act of violence which should be sure to come to the king's ears. It does not appear that he was really actuated by hatred of the Jewish people.

sent above five hundred men of war to take him.] This can scarcely have been necessary. It must almost certainly have been done to draw attention and remark.

41. when the multitude.] I.e. the 500 soldiers. Compare v. 20.

would have taken the tower.] Rather, "were at the point of taking the tower." It is difficult to explain the use of the article before the word "tower," unless by supposing the abbreviator to follow his author in so doing, but to have omitted a previous reference to the fact that Razis took refuge in a tower. Gorionides says that he took refuge in his private house, which may, however, have possessed a "tower" or "keep" of its own.

and violently broken into the outer door.] Rather, "and were forcing the outer door." The αὐλαία (or αὐλεία) θύρα is the door leading from the street into the αὐλή, or main court of the mansion. It consisted of two flaps or valves meeting in the middle. Hence the singular θύρα of this clause is followed by the plural, θύραι, in the next.

and bade.] Rather, "and were commanding."

he . . . fell upon his sword.] Suicide was most rare among the Jews until the time of the Zealots (Joseph. 'Bell. Jud.' iii. 7; iv. 1). Saul's suicide is doubtful (compare 1 Sam. xxxi. 4 with 2 Sam. i. 6–10). Samson's act, if it is to be considered a suicide, is that of a very mixed and imperfect character. There is no praise, no approval, no allowance of suicide in the inspired Scriptures. Even a heathen (Plato) could see that it was desertion of the post in which a man had been placed by God ('Phædo,' § 6). The author of the present Book evidently approves of

B. C. cir. 161.

42 Choosing rather to die manfully, than to come into the hands of the wicked, to be abused otherwise than beseemed his noble birth:

43 But missing his stroke through haste, the multitude also rushing within the doors, he ran boldly up to the wall, and cast himself down manfully among the thickest of them.

44 But they quickly giving back, and a space being made, he fell down into the midst of the void place.

45 Nevertheless, while there was yet breath within him, being inflamed with anger, he rose up; and though his blood gushed out like spouts of water, and his wounds were grievous, yet he ran through the midst of the throng; and standing upon a steep rock,

B. C. cir. 161.

46 When as his blood was now quite gone, he plucked out his bowels, and taking them in both his hands, he cast them upon the throng, and calling upon the Lord of life and spirit to restore him those again, he thus died.

CHAPTER XV.

5 Nicanor's blasphemy. 8 Judas encourageth his men by his dream. 28 Nicanor is slain.

BUT Nicanor, hearing that Judas and his company were in the strong places about Samaria, resolved without any danger to set upon them on the sabbath day.

it under certain circumstances. He admires Razis, who acts "manfully" (v. 42), "boldly" (or "nobly") and "courageously" (v. 43). It has been forcibly argued from this, that he is not an inspired writer. (See Grimm ad loc.)

42. to be abused otherwise than beseemed his noble birth.] Grimm translates—"otherwise than beseemed his nobility of character." In either case, the motive is a low and selfish one, resting upon pride and self-conceit, not a motive that could in any way justify even a doubtful action.

43. through haste.] Literally, "through the haste of the struggle;" i.e. the haste which the struggle necessitated.

the multitude also.] Compare v. 41. "The multitude" are the 500 men-at-arms (v. 39).

up to the wall.] Rather, "up on the wall." He ran up the steps which led to the top of the tower and mounted on the parapet of the wall.

44. he fell down into the midst of the void place.] Κενεῶν has this meaning in Nonnus and the Greek Anthology. Among the classical writers it means "the flank"—"the hollow between the ribs and the hip." Some would translate here—"he fell on his loins" or "on his belly." But the A.V. is probably right.

45, 46. The description of these last two verses is in the worst possible taste. It is disgusting, horrible, and a heap of impossibilities. If the narrative up to the end of v. 44 is true, we may be quite certain that Razis was killed by his fall, and did not rise from the ground after he struck it. The author has an unfortunate habit of gloating over the details of horrid deaths (ch. vii. 3–13; ix. 5–10, &c.), and here outdoes himself in coarseness and ferocity of description.

46. calling upon the Lord of life and spirit to restore him those again.] Compare ch. vii. 11. The doctrine of the "resurrection of the body" is evidently held by the writer in its plainest and most literal sense.

CHAPTER XV.

§ 4. NICANOR DESIGNS TO ATTACK JUDAS ON THE SABBATH, BUT IS BALKED OF HIS PURPOSE.

1–6. The author does not seem to be aware that it had been determined, even under Mattathias, that defensive warfare was permissible on the Sabbath (1 Macc. ii. 41); since which time no Syro-Macedonian leader could expect to gain much by choosing that day for attacking the patriots. Apparently, he supposes that Judas would not have offered resistance on the Sabbath. But, had that been the case, the insurrection must have been strangled in its birth. The present passage has thus no historical value.

1. Judas and his company were in the strong places about Samaria.] Capharsalama, where Nicanor engaged Judas before his denunciations against the Temple (1 Macc. vii. 31–35), was on the Samaritan border; but Adasa, where Judas had now stationed himself (ib. v. 40), was much nearer Jerusalem, being in the immediate vicinity of Beth-horon, and not far from Bethel. Thus the writer's geography is at fault, no less than his history.

resolved without any danger to set upon them.] This had been done once, and once only, in the course of the war—viz. at its very commencement. (See 1 Macc. ii. 32–38.) The Jews had then offered no resistance and been massacred. Subsequently a common-sense view prevailed; and while the Jews,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

2 Nevertheless the Jews that were compelled to go with him said, O destroy not so cruelly and barbarously, but give honour to that day, which he, that seeth all things, hath honoured with holiness above other days.

3 Then the most ungracious wretch demanded, if there were a Mighty one in heaven, that had commanded the sabbath day to be kept.

4 And when they said, There is in heaven a living Lord, and mighty, who commanded the seventh day to be kept:

5 Then said the other, And I also am mighty upon earth, and I command to take arms, and to do the king's business. Yet he obtained not to have his wicked will done.

6 So Nicanor in exceeding pride and haughtiness determined to set up a publick monument of his victory over Judas and them that were with him.

7 But Maccabeus had ever sure confidence that the Lord would help him:

8 Wherefore he exhorted his people not to fear the coming of the whenever they could, rested on the Sabbath, they held themselves free to fight if attacked. It is certainly strange that the writer did not know this.

2. the Jews that were compelled to go with him.] This, too, is probably unhistorical. It was not the habit of the Syro-Macedonian commanders to impress the devout Jews into their service, and force them to bear arms against their compatriots. They do not seem even to have enrolled in their armies the Jews who sided with them.

he that seeth all things.] Rather, "He that overseeth all things"—that has the oversight and management of them.

3. the most ungracious wretch.] See the comment on ch. viii. 34. It is sinfulness, not ungraciousness, that is charged against Nicanor.

if there were a Mighty one.] Literally, "a Dynast," "a Ruler." Nicanor does not doubt the existence of a dynast in heaven—he would probably have admitted many such dynasts: what he doubts is, whether any one of them has commanded the observance of the seventh day.

4. they said, There is in heaven, &c.] Their reply was—"The Lord who liveth in heaven is himself a Mighty one, who has commanded the observance of the Sabbath day."

5. And I also am mighty upon earth.] Rather, "a mighty one." The point of the story is that Nicanor, in a certain sense, places himself on a par with God. "There is perhaps a Mighty one in heaven who has commanded one thing; but there is also a Mighty one upon earth—myself—who commands the contrary. Which will you obey?" It is implied that the Jews in his army (v. 2) preferred to obey God, and that, in consequence, his design came to nought. Grimm's objection, that their number cannot have been large enough to induce him to alter his plans, is an objection, not to this view of the author's meaning, but to the historical character of his narrative.

6. So Nicanor . . . determined.] Rather, "Now Nicanor had determined." He had made up his mind to destroy the whole party of Judas at one fell swoop, and then to set up a grand monument to commemorate his victory. The monument was to follow the general character of the Greek "trophee."

§ 5. MACCABÆUS RAISES THE SPIRITS OF HIS COUNTRYMEN BY PUTTING BEFORE THEM VARIOUS CONSIDERATIONS, AND ESPECIALLY BY RELATING TO THEM A VISION WHICH HAS APPEARED TO HIM.

7–16. There is nothing improbable in this narrative. Judas, reduced to great straits, at the head of a force consisting of no more than 3000 men (1 Macc. vii. 40), and opposed to a large army of Syro-Macedonians under a leader of repute, was likely to use every effort to raise the spirits of his soldiers, and may well have encouraged them to engage, not only by employing the ordinary topics, but by telling them of a vision that he had had. On the eve of a battle, great commanders of a sensitive temperament are liable to have strange dreams. (See 'Records of the Past,' vol. iv. p. 43; Plut. 'Vit. Alex.' § 24; Joseph. 'Ant. Jud.' xi. 5, &c.) And, as the thoughts of Judas during the day were turned especially toward the subject of Divine aid (v. 7), they may well have shaped his dreams at night into the form here given. We may even go further, and say that the occasion would not have been an unworthy one for an actual Divine vision. Israel was brought very low. Had the three thousand not been animated by a confident hope, they would probably have suffered complete defeat, and the national movement might have been crushed. This was not in accordance with the Divine

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161. heathen against them, but to remember the help which in former times they had received from heaven, and now to expect the victory and aid, which should come unto them from the Almighty.

9 And so comforting them out of the law and the prophets, and withal putting them in mind of the battles that they won afore, he made them more cheerful.

10 And when he had stirred up their minds, he gave them their charge, shewing them therewithal the falsehood of the heathen, and the breach of oaths.

11 Thus he armed every one of them, not so much with defence of shields and spears, as with comfortable and good words: and beside that, he told them a dream worthy to be believed, as if it had been so indeed, which did not a little rejoice them. B. C. cir. 161.

12 And this was his vision: That Onias, who had been high priest, a virtuous and a good man, reverend in conversation, gentle in condition, well spoken also, and exercised from a child in all points of virtue, holding up his hands prayed for the whole body of the Jews.

13 This done, in like manner there appeared a man with gray hairs, and exceeding glorious, who was of a wonderful and excellent majesty.

14 Then Onias answered, saying, This is a lover of the brethren, who will, and something beyond natural means may have been employed to prevent it.

8. to remember the help which in former times they had received from heaven.] See above, ch. viii. 5, 6, 18, 23, 24, 36; x. 16, 17, 25, 29; xii. 22, &c.

the victory and aid which should come unto them.] Judas was confident on account of his vision. He was not always so certain of victory. (See 1 Macc. iv. 10, ix. 10; 2 Macc. xi. 7.)

9. And so comforting them out of the law and the prophets.] There is no "so" in the original. A fresh mode of encouragement is intended, additional to those previously mentioned. This was probably the reading of certain appropriate passages from the Law and the Prophets aloud before the people. (Compare ch. viii. 23.)

that they won afore.] Rather, "that they had won"—the battles against Apollonius (1 Macc. iii. 11), Seron (ib. vv. 23, 24), Gorgias (ib. iv. 14, 15), Lysias (ib. vv. 34–36), Timotheus (ib. v. 43; 2 Macc. viii. 30), and others.

10. he gave them their charge.] Probably to seize their arms and begin the march (Grimm).

shewing them . . . the falsehood . . . the breach of oaths.] According to our author, there had been an actual peace concluded between Judas and Nicanor, which the latter had been compelled by Demetrius to "make void" without having any excuse to offer for so doing (ch. xiv. 27, 28). If this were so, Judas had ample foundation for his complaints, without raking up such bygone matters as the treachery of Apollonius in B.C. 168 (ch. v. 25) or the misdeed of the Joppites in B.C. 164 (ch. xii. 3, 4).

11. a dream worthy to be believed, as if it had been so indeed.] It is not very clear what our translators meant by this. The MSS. have two readings—ὄνειρον ἀξιώπιστον ὕπαρ τι and ὄν. ἀξ. ὑπέρ τι. If we prefer the former, we must translate "a dream worthy of belief, which was a sort of waking vision;" if the latter, "a dream worthy of belief beyond aught else." In neither case is any doubt intended to be cast on the reality of the vision.

12. Onias, who had been high priest.] Compare ch. iii. 1. Onias III. is meant, who held the high-priestly office from B.C. 198 to B.C. 175.

a virtuous and a good man.] On the character of Onias, see above, ch. iii. 1, 4, 5; iv. 2. On his murder by Andronicus, see ch. iv. 34, 35.

gentle in condition.] Rather, "in behaviour."

13. a man with gray hairs and exceeding glorious.] Literally, "a man conspicuous for gray hairs and glorious appearance."

14. Onias answered, saying.] Judas had recognised Onias, whom he had doubtless known, but could not tell who was his companion. Onias "answered" his thought or look of inquiry.

This is a lover of the brethren.] Literally, "the lover," i.e. the one among the saints who loves them beyond all others. It is not clear why Jeremiah should have been assigned so prominent a position; but there are several prayeth much for the people, and for the holy city, to wit, Jeremias the prophet of God.

B. C. cir. 161.

15 Whereupon Jeremias holding forth his right hand gave to Judas a sword of gold, and in giving it spake thus,

16 Take this holy sword, a gift from God, with the which thou shalt wound the adversaries.

17 Thus being well comforted by the words of Judas, which were very good, and able to stir them up to valour, and to encourage the hearts of the young men, they determined not to pitch camp, but courageously to set upon them, and manfully to try the matter by conflict, because the city and the sanctuary and the temple were in danger.

B. C. cir. 161.

18 For the care that they took for their wives, and their children, their brethren, and kinsfolks, was in least account with them: but the greatest and principal fear was for the holy temple.

19 Also they that were in the city took not the least care, being troubled for the conflict abroad.

indications that he occupied a leading place in the thoughts of the later Jews. (See ch. ii. 1–8; Matt. xvi. 14; 2 Esdras ii. 18.) Dean Stanley says that he "had come to be regarded as almost the Patron Saint of Palestine" ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 321).

15. Jeremias . . . gave to Judas a sword of gold.] The "sword" of this passage (ῥομφαία) is to be distinguished from the "sword" (μάχαιρα) of 1 Macc. iii. 12, which Judas had hitherto employed. The ῥομφαία was the long broadsword of the Thracians—a much more formidable weapon than the short μάχαιρα or ξίφος; and though given only in vision, indicated an increased power of slaughtering enemies. By "a sword of gold" we are to understand a sword with a golden hilt, and with the blade also, perhaps, inlaid partly with gold. On the appropriation of gold to the dress, arms, and accoutrements of divine personages, see the comment on ch. x. 29.

16. with the which thou shalt wound the adversaries.] Rather, as Dean Stanley translates, "And with it thou shalt crush thine enemies." The whole idea of the vision was, that such a powerful aid was vouchsafed from heaven as would utterly crush and destroy the entire force of the Syro-Macedonians.

§ 6. THE TWO ARMIES ADVANCE TO THE CONFLICT. THE PRAYER OF JUDAS IMMEDIATELY BEFORE ENGAGING.

17–24. Animated to the highest pitch of confident daring by the exhortations of Judas, and especially by his narrative of his vision, the small company of Jews insisted on marching at once against the enemy, being eager to engage. They felt that the battle would be decisive of their fate as a nation. If they were successful, all would be well; if the contrary, the country, city, Temple would be lost. The writer represents them as chiefly anxious about the Temple—so lately recovered, so greatly in danger of being again lost, so blasphemously threatened by their proud enemy. Friends, brethren, kinsfolk, even wife and children, were of less account than the recently purified sanctuary (ὁ καθηγιασμένος ναός). At Jerusalem the peril was equally clearly seen, and the issue expected with even greater anxiety. The two armies drew near. Judas, "with his small band, saw the large and variegated host of the Syrians approach, the furious elephants snorting in the centre, the cavalry hovering on the wings. It was, if ever, a time and place to invoke the Divine aid which supports the few against the many" (Stanley). Judas's prayer is given with substantial agreement by the authors of both the First and the Second Book (1 Macc. vii. 41, 42; 2 Macc. xv. 22–24). It invoked upon the proud blasphemer of the day the fate of Sennacherib.

17. the words of Judas, which were very good.] Rather, "which were altogether noble."

to encourage the hearts of the young.] Rather, "to revive the spirits." It is implied that they had been drooping and depressed.

they determined not to pitch camp.] The author of the First Book says, that Judas "pitched in Adasa" (ch. vii. 40). The present writer does not contradict the statement. He only means that, after hearing the account of the vision, the army on the same day encountered the enemy.

the sanctuary.] Grimm translates, "the religion;" but it is better to understand by τὰ ἅγια, "the Temple building," and by τὸ ἱερὸν, "the sacred enclosure."

18. the care that they took.] Rather, "the anxiety that they felt."

was in least account.] Rather, "in less account." No doubt it was very great; but it was not so great as their anxiety for the Temple.

19. they that were in the city took not the least

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161.

20 And now, when as all looked what should be the trial, and the enemies were already come near, and the army was set in array, and the beasts conveniently placed, and the horsemen set in wings,

21 Maccabeus seeing the coming of the multitude, and the divers preparations of armour, and the fierceness of the beasts, stretched out his hands toward heaven, and called upon the Lord that worketh wonders, knowing that victory cometh not by arms, but even as it seemeth good to him, he giveth it to such as are worthy:

22 Therefore in his prayer he said after this manner; O Lord, [a]thou didst send thine angel in the time of Ezekias king of Judea, and didst slay in the host of Sennacherib an hundred fourscore and five thousand:

B. C. cir. 161.

[a] 1 Mac. 7. 40, 41. ch. 8. 19.

23 Wherefore now also, O Lord of heaven, send a good angel before us for a fear and dread unto them;

24 And through the might of thine arm let those be stricken with terror, that come against thy holy people to blaspheme. And he ended thus.

25 Then Nicanor and they that care.] Dean Stanley notes that the hills about Beth-horon, near which the fight took place, "are visible from Jerusalem." Thus the city was in the greatest excitement. Translate, "They that were in the city experienced no common agony."

20. when as all looked what should be the trial.] Rather, "what should be the decision"—how the matter should end.

the beasts conveniently placed.] By "the beasts" are clearly meant "the elephants." It has been argued that Nicanor could have had no elephants, since, shortly before Demetrius obtained the throne, certain Roman commissioners had forced Lysias to surrender the Syrian elephant-force, and had massacred the unfortunate animals (Grimm on 2 Macc. xiv. 12). Such a massacre certainly took place (Polyb. xxxi. 12; Appian, 'Syriac.' § 46). But it is open to question, (1) whether Lysias surrendered the whole force; and (2) whether Demetrius did not supply the place of those that were killed by fresh purchases. The onerous conditions of the treaty of Magnesia were, as much as possible, evaded by the Syrian kings.

the horsemen set in wings.] Rather, "on the wings." Compare the arrangement of Antiochus the Great at Magnesia (Liv. xxxvii. 40).

21. the divers preparations of armour.] Livy says of the army of Antiochus the Great at Magnesia—"Regia acies varia magis multis gentibus, dissimilitudine armorum auxiliorumque erat" (l. s. c.). Nicanor's army probably presented a similar variety on a smaller scale.

called upon the Lord that worketh wonders.] Or, according to another reading, "called upon the wonder-working, all-seeing God."

22. thou didst send thine angel in the time of Ezekias.] See 2 Kings xix. 35; 2 Chron. xxxii. 21; Is. xxxvii. 36.

and didst slay.] Some MSS. give καὶ ἀνεῖλεν, "and he slew," for καὶ ἀνεῖλες, "and didst slay." The difference is unimportant.

23. send a good angel before us.] Compare ch. xi. 6.

24. those . . . that come against thy holy temple.] Rather, "that came." The reference is to the past action of Nicanor recorded in ch. xiv. 31–33.

§ 7. DEFEAT AND DEATH OF NICANOR. TREATMENT OF HIS BODY. APPOINTMENT OF NICANOR'S DAY.

25–36. The two armies advanced to the encounter, the Syrians with trumpets and singing, the Jews with calling on God and prayer. There was scarcely any struggle. Nicanor fell in the first onset (1 Macc. vii. 43), and his army "cast away their weapons and fled" (ib. v. 44). The rout was complete. Our author calculates the slain at 35,000; but the older historian does not venture on any estimate. On the return from the pursuit, Nicanor's body was found, and on account of his blasphemies was treated with indignity. The head and right arm were struck off and carried to Jerusalem, where they were held up before the Syrian garrison in the Acra by way of derision. The head, after the tongue had been cut out, was actually nailed to the wall of the heathen fortress. The tongue which had blasphemed was chopped into small pieces and thrown to the birds. The hand and arm that had been stretched out to threaten the Holy Place was fastened to the "Beautiful Gate"—thence called "the Gate of Nicanor." Finally, in commemoration of the victory, the day of its occurrence, the 13th of Adar, was appointed for annual observance, and became known as "Nicanor's day."

25. Nicanor and they that were with him came forward with trumpets and songs.] On were with him came forward with trumpets and songs.

Digitized by Microsoft®

26 But Judas and his company encountered the enemies with invocation and prayer.

27 So that fighting with their hands, and praying unto God with their hearts, they slew no less than thirty and five thousand men: for through the appearance of God they were greatly cheered.

28 Now when the battle was done, returning again with joy, they knew that [b] Nicanor lay dead in his harness.

29 Then they made a great shout and a noise, praising the Almighty in their own language.

30 And Judas, who was ever the chief defender of the citizens both in body and mind, and who continued his love toward his countrymen all his life, commanded to [c] strike off Nicanor's head, and his hand with his shoulder, and bring them to Jerusalem.

31 So when he was there, and had called them of his nation together, and set the priests before the altar, he sent for them that were of the tower, 32 And shewed them vile Nicanor's head, and the hand of that blasphemer, [d] which with proud brags he had stretched out against the holy temple of the Almighty.

33 And when he had cut out the tongue of that ungodly Nicanor, he

B. C. cir. 161.

[b] 1 Mac. 7. 43.

B. C. cir. 161.

[c] 1 Mac. 7. 47.

[d] ch. 14. 33.

the use of "trumpets" by the Syrians see ch. v. 31. The "songs" intended are war-songs—properly "songs of triumph after a victory" (Liddell and Scott ad voc.), but sometimes also sung before one (Thuc. i. 50, iv. 43; Æsch. 'Pers.' l. 393; Xen. 'Cyrop.' iv. 1, § 6; Plut. 'Vit. Lycurg.' § 22), in anticipation of it. Nicanor and his men were no doubt confident of victory.

27. fighting with their hands, and praying unto God with their hearts.] Dean Stanley compares the conduct of Cromwell's Ironsides ('Lectures on the Jewish Church,' vol. iii. p. 322).

they slew no less than thirty and five thousand men.] Compare the estimates in ch. x. 17, 23; xii. 23, 26, 28. The graduation by sums each 5000 more or less than the others (20,000, 25,000, 30,000, 35,000) indicates the roughness of the estimate. At the same time the fact that this is the largest amount of slain recorded by the author indicates that he considered the defeat to be the most crushing that the Syrians suffered at the hands of Judas.

for through the appearance of God they were greatly cheered.] Once more a miraculous appearance, generally visible to the army, seems to be meant—an appearance whereof the earlier historian has no knowledge. (Compare ch. iii. 25, 33; ch. x. 29, 30; ch. xi. 8; and ch. xii. 22.)

28. when the battle was done.] Literally, "when they were come from the business." The "business" of the pursuit and slaughter is intended.

they knew that Nicanor lay dead.] Rather, "they perceived." Dean Stanley supposes that he was recognised by the splendour of his armour ('Lectures,' &c., vol. iii. p. 323).

29. in their own language.] The use of this phrase seems to imply that Greek was already the tongue most frequently spoken by the Jews.

30. Judas . . . who continued his love toward his countrymen all his life.] Rather, "who still retained the love for his countrymen that he had in his youth."

to strike off Nicanor's head and his hand.] The head and hand had both sinned—the head, in that the brain conceived the blasphemous thought of ch. xiv. 33, and the mouth uttered it; the hand, in that it was stretched out threateningly against the Most High. It was not the habit of the Jews to mutilate the bodies of the slain; but the case of Nicanor was regarded as exceptional, and so as justifying exceptional treatment.

with his shoulder.] Rather, "with the arm." Compare ch. xii. 35.

31. he sent for them that were of the tower.] The chief men of the Acra are evidently intended. They were certainly not under his authority, and he could not require their attendance. But he may have sent for them on the plea of negotiations (Grotius), or simply telling them that he had something of importance to communicate. It was for them to attend or not as they pleased. According to our author, they obeyed his summons.

32. shewed them vile Nicanor's head and the hand, &c.] Not only certifying to them Nicanor's death, but making them aware, at any rate in part, of the punishment with which it had been determined to visit his blasphemy.

which . . . he had stretched out against the holy temple.] See ch. xiv. 33, and compare 1 Macc. vii. 47.

33. when he had cut out the tongue of that

Digitized by Microsoft®

commanded that they should give it
51. by pieces unto the fowls, and hang up the reward of his madness before the temple.

34 So every man praised toward the heaven the glorious Lord, saying, Blessed be he that hath kept his own place undefiled.

35 He hanged also Nicanor's head upon the tower, an evident and manifest sign unto all of the help of the Lord.

36 And [e] they ordained all with a common decree in no case to let that day pass without solemnity, but to celebrate the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which in the Syrian tongue is called Adar, the day before [f] Mardocheus' day.

37 Thus went it with Nicanor: and from that time forth the Hebrews had the city in their power. And here will I make an end.

38 And if I have done well, and as

B. C. cir. 161.

[e] 1 Mac. 7. 49.

[f] Esth. 9. 17, 21.

ungodly Nicanor.] The object was to emphasize the guilt of this particular member, which had committed the chief sin. No doubt there was a ghastly horror and savagery about the act; but it was striking, dramatic, and well calculated to make the Syrians cautious of repeating such wild threats as those which Nicanor had uttered. Compare the alleged treatment of the head of Cyrus by Tomyris (Herod. i. 214) and the Parthian treatment of the head of Crassus (Florus, iii. 11, § 11; Dio Cass. xl. 27).

unto the fowls.] I.e. "the birds of the air."

and hang up the reward of his madness before the temple.] "The reward" (or rather "punishment") of Nicanor's madness seems to be the severed right hand and arm, which, according to tradition, was "nailed to the main eastern entrance of the inner court of the Temple, known long after as the Gate Beautiful, but also as 'the Gate of Nicanor' from this terrible reminiscence" (Stanley, 'Lectures,' l. s. c.).

34. every man praised toward the heaven the glorious Lord.] "Crying toward heaven" is a common expression in the First Book, where the name of God is generally avoided. "Praising toward heaven" is a rare expression, but may be understood to mean, "with eyes and hands lifted up heavenwards." The word translated "glorious" means probably "present to aid," and glances back at v. 27.

35. He hanged also Nicanor's head upon the tower.] I.e. upon the external wall of the Acra. Compare the fastening of Saul's body by the Philistines to the wall of Beth-shan (1 Sam. xxxi. 10).

36. they ordained all with a common decree.] A decree of the Council of Elders, which was the chief civil authority at Jerusalem (ch. x. 8; xi. 27; xiv. 37), is probably intended. It was recognised that the civil power might lawfully appoint days for commemoration of events important to the nation with a religious ceremonial. (See Hooker, 'Ecclesiastical Polity,' v. 81, § 6.)

to celebrate the thirteenth day of the twelfth month.] Compare 1 Macc. vii. 49.

which in the Syrian tongue is called Adar.] "Adar" (Addaru) was the name of the twelfth month in the Babylonian Calendar ('Records of the Past,' vol. i. p. 164); and this name seems to have been adopted by the Jews during the Captivity from the Babylonians. Still it is quite possible that the Syrians knew the month by the same name. Or the writer may call the language which the Jews brought back from Babylon "the Syrian tongue."

the day before Mardocheus' day.] See Esther ix. 21.

§ 8. Epilogus, or concluding Remarks of the Author.

37–39. The author states his reason for concluding his work at this point, and invites the judgment of his readers on the manner in which he has accomplished his task. He has sought to give them a tempered draught, neither too stimulating nor too tasteless. The proof that he has succeeded will be in their satisfaction.

37. from that time forth the Hebrews had the city in their power.] This is scarcely true, if the entire city is meant; since the Acra and the whole western hill remained in the possession of the Syrians until the time of Simon, B.C. 142–1. (See 1 Macc. xiii. 49–51; xiv. 36.) It may have been true of the eastern city, if the author wrote before the time of John Hyrcanus, who was forced to surrender the entire city to Antiochus Sidetes in B.C. 133. Most critics, however, suppose that he wrote considerably later than this.

And here will I make an end.] In the original this clause stands in the closest connection with what precedes. Translate—"Matters having thus gone with Nicanor and the Hebrews having from that time forth

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 161. is fitting the story, it is that which I desired: but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto.

39 For as it is hurtful to drink wine or water alone; and as wine mingled with water is pleasant, and delighteth the taste: even so speech finely framed delighteth the ears of them that read the story. And here shall be an end. B. C. cir. 161.

had the city in their power, I also will here bring my relation to an end." The author means that he ends where the danger to the (eastern) city and Temple ended.

38. if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto.] Observe that the writer claims no inspiration—no divine assistance at all. The work is his own composition, and if defective is so through his defects. He only claims to have done as well as he could.

39. as it is hurtful to drink wine or water alone.] To drink wine untempered with water would be regarded in the East as naturally leading to intoxication. To drink water alone was probably reckoned unwholesome. (See 1 Tim. v. 23.)

speech finely framed.] Rather, "the arrangement of the narrative." The pleasure, i.e., of reading a history depends on the arrangement of its various facts and circumstances by the author, who must mingle "wine" with "water"—or highly-wrought and exciting passages with others of a more level and tamer cast—if he would give satisfaction to the reader. How far he has done this, the author leaves the reader to say.

THE END OF THE APOCRYPHA.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

Digitized by Microsoft®

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

BS 1692 1888 v.2 c.3
ROBA